"The following day the inhabitants decided to have a house in which to worship the true God. They sailed down the coast into savage country for poles, and although they were attacked and wounded, returned with their load. Bricks were made out of mud mixed with rice-chaff, moulded into shape and dried in the sun. We erected the walls, covered the roof with grass, and built a platform of mud. Then every evening, at the blowing of the 'conch,' the whole village turned out. They continued to carry their old benches till we procured new ones, and there they sat to be taught the everlasting Gospel of our Redeemer. In several weeks—not months—boys and girls learned many of our Psalms and hymns, whilst the elder people acquired more or less Christian knowledge.

"After laboring there day and night for six or eight weeks, I came to be much impressed by three different classes who attended our services. There were poor, old, toothless women, who had wrought hard in the constant struggle for existence, squatted on the bare earth weaving, and as they threw the thread they crooned in a low voice. Then there were the boys with their bright young faces into whose lives our songs brought something of hope, and all day long they sang in their own tongue our children's hymn:

Jesus loves me, this I know,
For the Bible tells me so.

And not the least attractive were the hardy, bold, brave fishermen, going out in the morning through the surf, standing—not sitting—in their boats, and as they pushed their long oars, kept time to the stroke, singing the old Scotch paraphrase:

I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Nor to defend His cause.

"Going right to one of the native villages of about three hundred inhabitants we were received with disdain. The men grunted, and calling out 'barbarian,' and 'foreign devil,' walked away. Women and children ran into thir houses, and then urged wolfish-looking dogs upon us. We stood listening to the yelping of these hungry creatures, and were obliged to leave, for not a soul in the village would hear our words. We visited another village and received similar treatment. This experience was repeated in a third village.

"At length three men, from a fishing village by the sea, came and said: 'You have been going through and through our plain, and no one has received you. Come to our village, and we will listen to you.'"

This village became nominally Christian. During the time Mr. MacKay and his associates stayed there, they endured many privations, sleeping in low, musty quarters on boxes or whatever they could, among a mass of cast-off idols which the people had rejected when they pledged themselves to follow the Saviour. He dried his wet clothing before fires made of "idolatrous paper, idols and ancestral tablets." He employed three men to carry a number of idols and other superstitious trumpery to the museum at Tansui. Other villagers made inquiries; representatives from them attended service occasionally, going long distances, and by and by invitations were received by the missionaries to visit their villages; so Mr. MacKay and his associates formed a procession, with the missionaries at the head and the converts in double column behind, all marching along the hilly paths and singing as they went, and thus with God's message sung and preached, they captured village after village. Soon buildings were erected, and native converts left in charge of the work. Hundreds of the natives threw away their idols and embraced Christianity, and a wave of soul-inspiring and glorious revival swept over many villages. Year after year the work of preaching to the dark-skinned aborigines was kept up energetically; chapels were erected in many places, the people entering with zeal into the word of construction. At last nineteen chapels were completed, and over each a native preacher was placed. The work has been increasingly blessed throughout North Formosa.

THE TIME OF THE JUDGES.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 6. Judges. 2:1-12, 16. Golden Text, Judg. 2: 16. By Mrs. Baxter.

THE purpose of God in bringing Israel out of Egypt was that he might have a people who should be a witness to him among the nations of the earth. They were to be a people separated from others before all else by the continual presence of their God in the pillar of cloud and of fire upon the Tabernacle (Ex. 33: 16), and by the fact that they were under his immediate control as he made known his will to Moses and Joshua. They were to be a people through whom other nations might learn to know the living God. His purpose was that constant communication between God and man should be sustained; and that Jacob's vision of the ladder, with the angel messengers between earth and heaven, should be an unbroken experience of the people who were his inheritance. Although the wilderness journey was at an end, and the manna had ceased, he had made provision for faith in him in his ordaining of the Sabbath year with the promise: "I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years." (Lev. 25: 3-7: 20-22.) He made it

A Test of Faith.

His people would see the nations around them sowing their land, and were to reply to their enquiries why they did not do the same, that the year was holy unto the Lord, and that while they served him the store of the previous year would hold out for three years, and they could trust their God to fulfil his promise. But with his promises, the Lord had also given commandments to his people that when they should be come into the land of promise they should utterly drive out and utterly destroy the inhabitants of the land. In this his children were not obedient: "It came to pass, when Israel was waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to task work, and did not utterly drive them out." (Josh 17: 12, 13; Judges 1: 27-35.) Thus the children of Israel were content to dwell in the same country with the people whose deeds were "an abomination unto the Lord." A man of faith never waxes strong, he measures his resources not with his fellowmen, but with the living God, and therefore depends on him always.

The people failed their God; they did not rise to their vocation; they did not understand his purpose or enter into it, and by the very fact that they were his covenant people, they became a curse among the heathen instead of a blessing, they were "taken up in the lips of talkers, and the evil report of the people," (Ezek. 36: 3), and they profaned God's name among the nations whither they went after the Lord had cast them out of their own land. (Ezek. 36: 21). Separated unto God they departed from him: witnesses of his providing care, they profaned his Sabbaths and looked after their own interests, cutting off the opportunity which God sought for to prove his love and care for those who trusted in him.

Things had come to a point at the time our chapter treats of. Israel had indeed served the Lord all the days of Joshua, all the days of the elders that had outlived Joshua, and had known the work of the Lord, that he had wrought for Israel." (Josh. 24: 31, Judges 2: 7). But with all their service of harboring among them those whom the Lord had called them to destroy utterly. They had found it answered their purpose to use the inhabitants of Canaan as slaves and task workers such as they had been in Egypt: they did not take God's side to extirpate them; they "did every man that which was right in his own eyes." (Judges 21: 25). But this state of disobedience could not always go on without things coming to a head: "That generation were gathered to their fathers: and there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord, nor yet the work which he had wrought for Israel."

How could this be? If the present generation had seen every seven years in their land the miracle of fertility without labor; if they had seen their fathers extirpating the inhabitants of the land, however strong, in the assurance that God would not fail to overcome them because of his promise, if those fathers had indeed diligently taught of the Word of their God unto their children, and talked of it, when they sat in their house, and when they walked by the way, and when they lay down, and when they rose up, (Deut. 6: 7), that generation could not have been ignorant of God. But the influence of heathenism all around them, the possibility of contrasting the service of God, in minds not renewed by the Holy Spirit, with the advantages of being free from the discipline of the law of God, to give unbridled license to their desires, and their passions as the heathen did, bore its deadly fruit among the people. Disobedience bore its fruit, and what goes by the name of liberal sentiments to-day, obtained among the people of the Lord, and they ceased to be a separate people.

The Fear of God Declined,

A crisis must come: "The angel of the Lord came up from Gilgal to Bochim. And he said: I made you to go up out of Egypt and have brought you unto the land which I sware unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break my covenant with you: and ye shall make no covenant with the inhabitants of the land; ye shall break down their altars; but ye have not hearkened unto my voice, why have ye done this?" A question indeed, but one which did not wait for man's explanation. It was too late for this, God had already in his perfect wisdom and holy justice decided what to do. "Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you: but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you." It was a terrible sentence, but it was just, God cannot be trifled with. The people understood, they lifted their voice and wept; they were broken for the time. The place of their repentance was called Bochim [i. e. weepers] because of their tears, and they sacrificed there unto the Lord. But the sentence was past and it was irrevocable under the law.

And we children of the New Covenant, are we not called to be a special people? Is it not our high vocation to be in our life and conversation every day and hour God's witnesses that he lives and that he "worketh for him that waiteth for him" (Isa. 44: 4)? And has he not also commissioned us to mortify or make dead our members which are upon the earth, and to put away also all these: anger, wrath, malice, railing, shameful speaking out of the mouth, and lying to another (Col. 3: 5-9)? And are we not commanded to put on a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another and forgiving one another even as the Lord forgave (Col. 3: 12, 13)? And are we also disobedient and trifling with God? The children of Israel were chosen and brought out of Egypt to be God's light among the nations; we are brought out of sin and condemnation, and filled with the Holy Spirit, that we may be a company of God-filled men and women, carrying God with us wherever we go, and witnessing by our very presence more than our words against all that is not of God. Are we by act and word fulfilling

Our Vocation?

The most pungent grief and shame which can come upon the heart of a true child of God is to find that he hss said or done something unlike his Master. A true man of God would rather lose any property, rather be deprived of any comfort, rather be despised by his most valued friends, than wrong the Lord who bought him, and he who has such a spirit has yet to become "a new creature," for old things have not yet passed away in him, and all things are not yet become new. Sins of omission lead to sins of commission. The children of Israel having failed to drive out the idolaters from the land, were led away by their example and turned to practise idolatry.

ANCIENT IMAGE OF BAAL.

BEFORE the death of Joshua there were evidences that the people were being corrupted by association with the Canaanites. God's command was to drive them out, but many were suffered to remain. In this book of Judges there is frequent reference to communities of Canaanites, that continued to occupy their old settlements. Apparently the people, who were never a warlike race, shrank from the inevitable bloodshed, and in one case they were outwitted into making a treaty of peace with them. (See Joshua 9.) The Philistines, also, were not evicted. They were immigrants like the Hebrews, but coming by sea, had driven the Canaanites out of the rich southwestern lands of Palestine, and settled there. They, too, became a source of trial and disquietude. The Hebrews saw the Baal-worship with all its orgies going on at their doors, and fell into the snare. Doubtless, one cause of their fall was that they had not attained the conception of Jehovah as the only God. Rather, as we see by incidental remarks in the earlier books of the Bible, they regarded him as the greatest among many Gods. Each nation around them had its god, and Jehovah was stronger than any of them, as he had proved by enabling them to occupy the land. But Baal was to them a real deity, inferior to Jehovah, it is true, but as the god of the land, capable of doing them good or harm in turning the land fertile, or sterile, or sending diseases upon them. Thus they were inclined to conciliate him, as far as they could without offending Jehovah. The first five verses of the lesson recount a reproof administered for an offence of this description. The whole of the book of Judges is occupied with the relations of the Hebrews with these idolatrous neighbors. It was a period of alternate peace and conflict, the one as disastrous as the other. In their wars they turned to God for help, but suffered at the hands of man; in peace they fell into idolatry and incurred the vengeance of God. The book is evidently not a chronological history of the period. Its author is unknown, though Jewish tradition ascribes it to Samuel. Whoever it was, seems to have made his book out of a number of documents, or oral traditions, which he did not attempt to weave into a continuous story. An illustration of this is seen in the sixth verse of the lesson, which has no connection with the preceding verse, but would follow naturally Joshua 24: 28. These separate documents render it impossible to construct a system of chronology of that time. Mention is made in the book of twelve judg besides Abimelech, who is not called judge, but there is no way of finding whether they succeeded each other whether two may have governed conte poraneously. The aggregate of the peri mentioned in the book is 410 years, but I. Kings 6: 1, the entire period from Exodus to the fourth year of Solomo reign is stated to be only 480 years, whi making the necessary deductions wo bring the period of the judges to 349 yea while Paul preaching at Antioch (A 13: 20), makes the period of the judg "about 450 years." It is the difference the estimates of the length of this per that causes the divergence in the dates signed by scholars to the Exodus and ot events antecedent to this period.

An angel of the Lord came up from Gil We know not in what form the angel ca It is sufficient to know that he brough message from God. God uses many kin of messengers. Sometimes it is a mini of the Gospel; sometimes it is a Sun School teacher or a friend; sometimes i sickness, or death, or only the silent vo of conscience. He came from Gilgal, wh the Israelites had witnessed God's in vention on their behalf. So, the mess gers of God to us frequently come as minders of past kindnesses on his part, reminders also of promises made th Louis XIV., of France, summoned Bour loue to preach before him and the co which was accounted a great honor. knew the King's life well and he preac eloquently against the sins the King lov He drew a picture of the man to wh God had given much, but had shewn gratitude nor holiness. Then, fixing eyes on the monarch, he exclaimed, "I art the man." Every one expected t there would be some sign of royal displ ure and Bourdaloue was urged to apolog He went to the King, but it was only to mind him that he could not have spo otherwise. When he stood up to pre his first duty was to be faithful to the m sage that God had given him to deliver

Another anecdote of a king and preacher is told of James the first of E land, who was James the sixth of Scotla a man of capricious and irresolute cha ter. During one of his journeys a cler man noted for his fearlessness was appo ed to preach before him. The clergyn announced his text in a way that made discourse sound personal. He opened Bible and said: "James first and sixth that wavereth." The king was heard mutter, "He is at me already."

The people served the Lord all the day Joshua. They had a good example, that is always helpful. One of the n beautiful epitaphs ever put on a graveste was that over the body of a girl. It r "Her playmates said it was easier to good when she was present." Jefferso well-known letter to George Washing shows at what a high value he estim the influence of his character. He wro "Your being at the helm will be more t an answer to every argument which ca used to alarm and lead the people in quarter into violence and secession. . . There is sometimes an eminence of cha ter on which society has such pecu claims as to control the predilection of individual for a peculiar walk of happin and restrain him to that alone, arising t the present and future benedictions of m kind. This seems to be your condition

Which knew not the Lord. That fact f accounted for their going astray after B whose images it was easy to know. W a man does not know God, he will not l him or fear him. That is the reason of wickedness in the world. If people kn how good God is, how loving and k they would be ashamed to grieve him. they knew his power and his justice, t would fear to offend him. But it is knowing things about him so much knowing him that influences life. A m ber of candidates for church membe were being examined and they gave h statements of doctrine. At last the t came of a poor woman who had rece no education. One question after anot she failed to answer and she feared t she would not be accepted. Clasping hands, while tears filled her eyes, she s "I cannot explain these things; I am sure I understand them; I know so l But I know Christ, and sir, I love him much that I could die for him." That claration was sufficient. She was accep and there was no more earnest and us Christian in that church.

Goodby to Mont-Lawn.

ll our Little Guests Gone and the Chil-drens' Home Closed for the Season.

IT was a pleasant party of little folks that sailed down the Hudson from Nyack to New York City on the steamer "Chrystenah," last Saturday forenoon. Yet, amid all their laughter ıd merriment, there would creep over their ın-browned faces a trace of sadness, and ıeir eyes would involuntarily turn back ıward the wooded heights of Mont-Lawn, here they had passed many happy hours. hey were the last party of little guests re-ırning from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ome. With their departure, all the light ıd life seemed to die out of the place. The road lawn, where twenty-four hundred ıildren have gayly romped this summer, ıd which had been worn bare in many aces by the ceaseless tread of active little et, was deserted. The pretty chapel, hose walls had so often echoed their erry chatter and the sweet sounds of their ymn-singing, was silent and desolate, and ıe spacious cottage, the Lodge at the gate ıd the great barn—scene of many a revel ıd wild frolic—were all hushed and quiet. ven the birds chirped and twittered in a fter key, as though they, too, missed ıeir little friends. And now cottage, chap- and the rest have all been closed till next eason, when, if God wills, the fresh young oices will again echo through the wood-nds and up and down the hillsides.

It has been a glorious and a beneficial oliday for the poor tenement children this ear. This result was greatly contributed) by the generosity of Rev. A.D. Lawrence ewett, D.D., who eclipsed his liberality of st year by giving all the buildings and hagnificent grounds at Mont-Lawn for the se of our Children's Home at the nominal ntal of $1 per month! To this good-heart-l Christian clergyman, the 2,400 children ve a debt of gratitude for much of the ıjoyment and benefit they derived from ıeir sojourn at the Home.

The Suffering Armenians.

Christians in Our Own Land Spontaneously Offer to Send Help to the Stricken Native Christians in Kurdistan.

ADDITIONAL mail dispatches from Van and other points in Kurdistan, which have been received during the past week, afford little hope of an early alleviation of the terrible suffering there. Among the Armenian villagers, who lost home and property during the Kurd troubles last year, and who are now practically wanderers on the face of the earth, the distress is increasing. All that the missionaries can do is being done to relieve the suffering; but as in the case of Dr. Grace N. Kimball (whose work of self-sacrifice was referred to in last week's issue), their means of aiding the sufferers are already exhausted. Some aid has been received from philanthropic organizations in other countries, but not to an extent that perceptibly modifies the situation.

Some of the accounts received of the hardships endured by the Armenians are distressing in the extreme. One correspondent writes that many of the refugees, weakened by want and exposure, are dying. Fully 1000 Armenian families in the province of Van alone are in want of food. A majority of these families

A WONDERFUL MEETING.

He who knows something by experience of the workings of God's providences through insignificant agencies, will not scorn even small opportunities. It is said that the late ISAAC ERRETT, when speaking in the interest of the American Christian Missionary Society, went to a country church in the Blue Grass region of Kentucky. It was harvest time, and the weather was warm. The "audience" which had assembled consisted of five or six farmers—no ladies being present.

"We won't try to have a meeting," said the good brother with whom DR. ERRETT had been stopping. "Ah but," said DR. ERRETT, with gentle firmness, "I always keep my appointments. I shall hold a meeting." He held a meeting. He melted those rich farmers to tears as he told of the needs of the missionaries, and of the heroic work they were doing, and at the end of the service each one of the hearers contributed five hundred dollars to the cause for which he had pleaded.

The preacher who thinks he can do nothing with a small congregation, will generally fulfill his own expectations. The man who is strong and of good courage, will not labor in vain nor spend his strength for naught.

are living on roots and herbs, some few fortunate ones having bread made of clover-seed, linseed or flax, mixed with grass and roots. In the district of Moks, three-fourths of the villagers have left and are in danger of starving. In Shadakh, two-thirds of the population are homeless wanderers. Beggars swarm in the streets of Van, but so general is the poverty that little help can be afforded. So widespread is the want that many have declared, in bitterness of heart, that "there is no food in all the length and breadth of Armenia"—which was long ago the Garden of Eden. Many poor are fed daily at the American mission in Van.

We waited long and impatiently for word of your progress, as I hoped you would be able to stir up our representative there to more efficient action. A very urgent request came to me through Mr. Hallward, to engage in the work of distributing relief money to these poor people, and so I left July 4, reached Moosh the 9th, and came up here two days later. We had to pull up the steep mountain side thirty-five hundred feet from Moosh, crossing huge snow banks and then down into this picturesque valley, still twelve hundred feet above Moosh, and fifty-seven hundred feet above sea level. Semal and Shenig are situated in a continuous, moderately wide valley, with a little reach of rolling land between the encircling mountains where about half the hill fields are growing green with a sort of millet that matures in a few weeks and which they were persuaded to come and sow, with oxen loaned by the poor, but generous villagers of the Moosh plain. These few fields and few people at work upon them, were all there was to relieve the sad desolation which reigned over all. Buildings, once the homes of happy and prosperous countrymen, now presented only ruined walls with not a chip to show they had ever roofs to cover them, save a few, of which a little corner was, rudely covered last fall, so that the wretched owners could find imperfect shelter during last winter. The torch of the incendiary soldiers had consumed every vestige of wood from all these scattered homes. The church at the central hamlet, where Der Hohannes whose eyes were bored out and his throat pierced, while yet alive, by the cruel soldiers, used to officiate, being of stone, was not consumed, being the only roofed building in all the valley, after that flood of carnage had swept past. Near this church we pitched our tent, and began to study the situation.

Beneath our eye, in these two villages, had already gathered over one thousand people, whom it was our work to try and set upon their feet again, so that they could start once more on the uphill road toward prosperity. Could a community be conceived of more completely prostrate? The sheep and cattle, which composed their wealth, in the hands of Koords, as also their few simple household belongings, cooking vessels, clothing, bedding, etc., and whatever money they may have managed to hoard. Those who fled with their lives found themselves nearly as destitute of all that makes life comfortable as the day they were born.

English liberality has already spent five thousand dollars, and the authorities gave reluctant consent to our coming up to distribute it. We located here at Semal, while the Turkish committee has its headquarters at Shenig, half an hour distant. It was evident that the thing to be first accomplished was the erection of houses, and only a few weeks remained in which it would be accomplished, so we set about persuading the people to begin preparing their walls for the timbers the government had promised them.

The writer adds that up to the time of forwarding his letter, no progress had been made in house-building. The autumnal storms of wind and rain were due, and naturally the missionaries felt very solicitous for the homeless and sick people. He adds:

Of the survivors of the massacre (of 1894), five thousand have already gathered to try and re-establish their old homes, while possibly another eleven hundred may still be scattered over the world. I am glad to believe that the first estimates of the slain were a good deal exaggerated. It was impossible to get into the region, and it was not known what proportion of the villages were destroyed. We now find that considerable extensive outlying sections were not reached. The number of the burned villages was thirty-two, the original population of which could not have much exceeded 10,000. It is impossible as yet to give the exact number of the slaughtered, but it will probably be not far from 4,000. We feel that unless a different status from the present can be secured to distribute anything to these people beyond daily food, is simply to run the risk of its falling into the hands of the Koords. We have distributed a good many tools, with which the people are gathering hay, in hope of having some animal to eat it during the winter. We should be glad to furnish them with tools for laying up the walls of their houses, and even pay the wages of masons to come and help them. It is all we can do now to prevent the people from fleeing again to the plain, when all their crops would go for naught. If light does not soon dawn, I shall feel that I am wasting my time here, and shall feel forced to send in my resignation. If the people are to come down on to the plain, the remaining funds will be needed to give them clothing and bedding, and this matter could be best managed from Moosh. I regret to be obliged to send such a blue report, but facts must be submitted as they are.

The writer of the foregoing is one of two missionaries of the American Board, who have engaged in the work of relief distribution at the request and by the appointment of the British Embassy at Constantinople. It is a hazardous service, yet someone must carry succor to those wretched victims of war and pestilence, if they are to be saved from perishing of famine and cold. The name of the writer of the letter is withheld, but the American Board officials in Boston have given us their assurances that it is authentic and true in every particular. Meanwhile the outlook is one to bring dismay even to brave hearts. With winter close at hand, the suffering among the homeless thousands must be intense, unless some means of succor and shelter are providentially provided beforehand. It is very desirable that whatever aid is to be rendered, should be sent quickly, in order that it may reach the hands of the missionaries in time to be of service in arresting suffering.

During the week we have received a number of letters from readers in different parts of the Union expressing the warmest sympathy for the suffering Armenian Christians, and desiring to know how they could best be helped in their present emergency. One lady, Miss M. E. B., writes from East Orange, N. J., as follows:

I have just heard of the terrible sufferings of the Armenians and I would like to do something for them. If I should send some money or clothing to you, would it be all right? I long to work in the foreign fields myself, but God has ordered differently. My health is all that keeps me back. But if I cannot go myself, I can help those who can go and who have gone, and I want to embrace every opportunity. My contribution will not be large, but I want Christ to say of me, "She hath done what she could."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has arrangements already under way for sending relief to the unfortunate Armenians, and will welcome the co-operation of all who have a sympathetic interest in their behalf. It would be useless to send clothing to such a distance, but all money contributions sent us will be forwarded to the missionaries now in the field for distribution in the relief work.

CHRONIC COMPLAINT.

FOR the last two or three years the land has been set to the tune of "Naomi." There has been here and there a cheerful soloist, but the grand chorus has been one of lamentation, accompanied by dirges over prostrated commerce, silent manufactories, unemployed mechanism, and all those disorders described by the two short words, "hard times." The best political economists tell us that there is no good reason for continued prostration. Plenty of money awaiting investment. Magnificent harvests ripening. The national health with never so strong an arm or so clear a brain. Yet many go on groaning, groaning, groaning, as though God had put this nation upon gruel and allowed us but one decent breakfast in six months. The fact is, the habit of complaining has become chronic in this country, and after all these years of whimper, and wailing, and objurgation, we are under such a momentum of snivel that we cannot stop.

I have noticed the people who are most vociferous of complaint are in comfortable circumstances. I have made inquiry of those persons who are violent in their jeremiads, and I have asked them: "Now, after all, are you not making a living?" After some hesitation, and coughing, and clearing their throat three or four times, they say, stammering: "Y-e-s." So that with a great multitude of people in our midst, it is not a question of getting a livelihood, but they are dissatisfied because they cannot make as much money as they would like to make. They have only two thousand dollars in the bank, where they would like to have four thousand. They can clear in a year only five thousand dollars when they would like to clear ten thousand, or things come out just even. Or in their trade they get two dollars a day when they wish they could get three or four. "O!" says some one, "are you not aware of the fact that there is a great population out of employment, and that there are hundreds of the good families of this country who are at their wit's ends, not knowing which way to turn?" Yes, I know it, better than any man in private life can know that sad fact, for it comes constantly to my ear and eye. But who is responsible for this state of things? Most of that responsibility I put upon you men in comfortable circumstances, who by an everlasting growling keep public confidence depressed, and new enterprises from getting on, and new houses from being built. You know very well that one despondent man can talk fifty men into despondency. My friends, representing as you do all professions, and all occupations, if you resolve never again to utter a dolorous word about money markets, but by manner, and by voice, and by wit and caricature, and above all by faith in God, to try to scatter this national gloom, do you not believe the influence would be instantaneous and widespread? The effect would be felt to-morrow morning in the money markets. For God's sake, and for the sake of the poor, and for the sake of the unemployed, quit growling. Let our fagged out business men find out that there is at least one prayer meeting, and one Sunday School, and one church filled with illumination. Depend upon, if you men in comfortable circumstances do not stop complaining, God will blast your harvests, and see how you will get along without a corn crop; and he will sweep you with floods; and he will devour you with grasshoppers; and he will burn your cities as he has done. If you men in comfortable circumstances keep on complaining, God will give you something to complaint about. Mark that!

THE OLD BOOK.

WE want no better proof of the Divinity of the Scriptures than the fact that it has withstood mighty and continued attack, and come down to us without a chapter effaced, or a parable riddled, or a miracle injured, or a promise scarred. No other book could have lived an hour in such a sea; no other force could have stood under such cross-fire. This Book to-day is foremost. In philosophy, it is honored above the works of Descartes, Bacon, Aristotle, and Socrates. In history, it wins more respect than Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon. In poetry, it far outshines the "Iliad" and "Odyssey," and "Æneid," the "Inferno," and "Paradise Lost." It has been published in several hundreds of languages. The earth quakes with the quick revolution of its printing-press. The best art has come to the illustration of its pages, to the adornment of its lids, to the setting of its type. Its scenes of glory and promise blossom on every wall, and thrill through the music of the oratorio and orchestra.

If infidelity is as successful in the next fifty years, in its war against the Bible, as it has been in the past fifty, the year 1950 will see the Bible in the possession of every man on the earth who has a hand to hold it. One wave of this Book above the thrones of tyranny, and they shall fall; above the temples of superstition, and they shall crumble; above the wilderness, and it shall bloom like the garden of the Lord. Thou Prince of Books, we hail thee to thy coronation! the wheeling earth thy chariot! the bending sky thy triumphal arch! the great heavens one star-studded, cloud-striped banner!

TOO LARGE A BUSHEL.

WE expect too much of our children when they become Christians. Do not let us measure their qualifications by our own bushel. We ought not to look for gravity and deep appreciation of eternal things, such as we find in grown persons. We have seen old sheep in the pasture-field look anxious and troubled because the lambs would frisk. No doubt the children that were lifted by their mothers into Christ's arms and got his blessing, five minutes after he set them down were as full of romp as before they came to him. The boy that because he has become a Christian is disgusted with ball-playing; the little girl who because she has given her heart to God has lost her interest in her waxen doll, are morbid and unhealthy. You ought not to set the life of a vivacious child to the tune of Old Hundred.

When the little ones come before you and apply for church membership, do not puzzle them with big words, and expect large "experiences." It is now in the Church as when the disciples of old told the mothers not to bother Christ with their babes. As in some households the grown people eat first, and the children have to wait till the second table, so there are persons who talk as though God would have the grown people first sit down at his banquet, and, if there is anything over, the little ones may come in for a share. No, no. If the supply at the Lord's table were limited, he would let the children come in first, and the older ones go without, as punishment for not having come in while they themselves were children. If the wind is from the northeast, and the air is full of frost and snow, and part of the flock must be left out on the mountains, let it be the old sheep, for they can stand it better than the lambs.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

H. V., Harmony, Pa. Is there any large denomination other than the Roman Catholic that holds that the body and blood of Christ are really present in the bread and wine of the Lord's Supper?

Both the Greek Church and many of the Lutheran Churches hold that belief. Luther was very positive on the subject, and held a public discussion on the question. At the beginning he took a piece of chalk and wrote on the black velvet cloth that covered the table, "Hoe est Corpus meum" (This is my body), that the words might be in a conspicuous place before the disputants.

R. H. Battermore, Lake City, Minn. Is there a law which can be enforced to prohibit people from binding, stacking and threshing on the Lord's Day, just near our doors? Our families are annoyed by such daring trampling on God's laws.

Communicate with the Secretary of the American Sabbath Union, Minneapolis, or with the Rest Day League, and you will be advised of the legal status of the case as far as your State legislation is concerned. It does not appear from the record that Minnesota has ever enacted any law to prevent Sunday desecration of the character described; but it may be possible to mitigate the evil, in the way adopted by the merchants of Fergus Falls, Minn., who compelled dealers, who insisted on opening their stores on the Lord's Day, to close them.

E. E. L., Denison, Tex. What does the preacher mean in saying (Eccles. 9: 11), that time and chance happen to all men?

You are not to take all the words of Ecclesiastes as true and inspired because, as he shows, he found out that what he said at one time was disproved later on. He is relating his experience. He was seeking happiness, with everything in favor of his succeeding. At first he believed he would find it in pleasure, afterward in learning, and later in other ways. And he tells how he found again and again that he had been mistaken. In this particular passage he means that the misfortunes of life are just as likely to happen to the wise and good as to the foolish. We know it is so. In a railroad accident, for instance, a clergyman or a philanthropist does not escape because of his life being beneficent.

C. W. Gregory, San Marcos, Tex. Will all the heathen be lost? A preacher said recently that if he did not believe they were, he would no longer contribute money to send the Gospel to them.

They are in God's hand; it would be presumption on our part to say what he will do with them. It is sufficient for us to know that it is our duty to preach the Gospel "to every creature." We can see no way in which salvation can come to those who died without the Gospel; but that does not prove that in the infinite resources of God's compassion, there is no way. The preacher you quote spoke rashly. The Gospel does more than save men from hell; it makes their lives on earth better. It is a blessing to the world, as Christian peoples well know, and we ought to send it to the heathen, even if we had not the impetus of such a fear as that of their eternal misery, to impel us to send it. It will make them better men if they accept it, as well as assure them of everlasting life.

Jas. A. McIntire, New York. Who were the translators of the version of the Bible now in common use? 2. From what version did they make their translation? 3. To what denomination did they belong?

1. There were fifty-four, but seven of them took no part in the work. Their names are not known. They worked in six companies. 2. They used the oldest manuscripts known at that day. Each member had one or more books of the Bible assigned to him, according to his special knowledge of the ancient languages. When his work was done he read it to his colleagues, who sat with copies of the Bible in English, French, Spanish, Italian, etc., in their hands, following him in his reading. If they disapproved of the use of any word they spoke and the matter was discussed and settled by vote. If they approved they were silent and he read on. 3. They belonged to the Church of England, equivalent to our Protestant Episcopal Church.

O. O. [illegible], Alexander, Mo. I am distressed by the assertions of the people around me that I cannot have a home in heaven if I am not baptized by immersion. Are they right? I believe I have been converted, but I am disturbed by the warnings of some Christian friends.

Then why not be baptized by immersion? It will do you no harm and will set all your doubts at rest. That is the best plan for every Christian who is worried on the subject. We knew of a prominent Methodist who not long ago took that course without severing his connection with the Methodist Church. He was in doubt as to the mode and would not allo so small a matter to be an obstacle. The were people in Paul's day, too, who laid good deal of stress on baptism (See 1. Cor. 11-17), but their trouble was chiefly as to t person who administered the rite. Paul treat their scruples with contempt. He said he h not been sent to baptize, but to preach t Gospel, and he thanked God he had baptiz so few. If he had thought the ceremony hel ed men to get to heaven he would have wis ed rather that he had baptized more. But knew better. He constantly declared, "b faith are ye saved," though there is no dou that he wished all his converts to be baptize

J. Love, Liberty, Mo. To settle a dispute and g much desired information will you kindly plain in THE MAIL-BAG, how is the passive Eleazar to be accounted for in the Promi Land, in the face of the limitation fixed Joshua 14: 30. He was alive at the time wh the inhibition was announced, and yet he pears afterward as a prominent actor in the h which he was forbidden to enter?

As none of the Israelites who were "nu bered" in the census that was taken after Exodus, except Joshua and Caleb, were p mitted to enter Canaan, all over twenty ye of age being included in the enumerat (Numb. 14: 29), it is a fair presumption th Eleazar must have been under twenty at time of the census. A Church Made of Cars.

The Colored Baptists of Baltimore, Md., have succeeded in acquiring a church home at very small cost. The street car companies have recently adopted the cable system on some of the lines and the trolley system on others. They had the horse-cars on their hands and found that it was difficult to dispose of them. This fact became known to the members of the First Colored Baptist Church of Mount Washington who have been meeting in a shoe-factory, being unable to raise the funds to erect a building. They perceived that a car might be so remodelled as to serve the purpose of a church and a committee was appointed to wait on the City and Suburban Railway Company and ascertain at what price a car or two could be bought. They succeeded beyond their hopes. The company made them a present of two cars. These have been fixed on trestles, close together, one side of each car being removed and the roofs connected so as to make one good-sized room. The seats have been taken out and replaced with benches, and a pulpit has been set up at one end. Much of the work was done by the members of the church at no cost, so that a very fair church building has been secured at very little expense. There is not much to be said for the architectural beauty of a church made of old cars, but it may serve the true purpose of a church, if the people who enter it are helped there to reach their heavenly destination, as the people who entered the cars when they were applied to their original use, were helped in their earthly travelling.

The Lord send thee help from the sanctuary. Psalm 20: 2.

A Thieving Tree.

A correspondent of a British journal describes a grievance that a farmer, with whom he has been spending a vacation, has worried over considerably. He had a maple tree in his yard of which he was very proud. It kept its leaves and looked fresh and green when the grass around and every tree and bush about the farm was drooping and wilted under the intense heat. He was so proud of the tree that he declared he would not part with it for "a plumb thousand dollars," and he persuaded the editor of an agricultural paper to come out and see it and write an article about the tree as "a natural phenomenon." But he has changed his opinion about it. Some time ago his pump was out of order and he sent for the local plumber, who after examining it said it needed new valves. New valves were put in but the pump was soon dry again. The plumber said he guessed a new piston was needed and that was put in. But the pump failed again. The farmer sent for another man who pried off the top of the cistern and went down. He called out that there was no water in the cistern which was the main reason the pump would not work. The farmer was astonished, for the cistern had never gone dry before, even in the driest summer. But the cause was soon discovered. The man down below called up again that there was a root of a tree as thick as his arm growing into the side of the cistern with "about a million little suckers on it." Then the farmer understood not only why his pump would not work, but why his maple tree had flourished and as the water was of more importance to him than the tree, the maple was ruthlessly condemned. The neighbors were surprised to see the farmer felling the maple of which he had been so proud, but no one blamed him when they heard what the tree had done. The farmer had no difficulty in estimating the comparative values of the water and the maple, but there is not always the same prompt decision in other matters of greater importance. There are many who cannot bear to part with some cherished sin, or some dear connection even when they know that it is sapping their spiritual life. But Christ said there was no alternative.

Wherefore if thy hand or thy foot causeth thee to stumble cut it off, etc. (Matt. 18: 8, R. V.)

Mislaid Indictments.

A find that appears to need an explanation was made a few days ago in New York. In the attic of the old brown stone building in City Hall Park which was formerly used by the Court of General Sessions, there was a dust-covered tin-box which appeared to have been a long time undisturbed. One of the employes about the building searching the attic for some papers, opened the box and was amazed to find that it was full of indictments. There were nearly two thousand of them ranging in date from 1863 to 1883. They were promptly sent to the District Attorney's office, but it is not likely that any action will now be taken on them. Many of the indicted persons are dead and most of the cases are outlawed. It is said that none of them were ever brought to trial, otherwise the absence of the documents would have been discovered. The offences they relate to include almost every crime on the calendar. There is sufficient reason for believing that the documents were not mislaid by accident. Some person friendly to the defendants probably removed them from time to time, and the District Attorney, finding nothing to remind him of the cases, forgot all about them. Had there been a proper record and index kept, it would not have been possible to arrange for such a miscarriage of justice. Doubtless many of the defendants passed a time of suspense not knowing but that any time the indictments against them might be found, and they be brought to trial. Some Christians have the same dread about the sins they committed before their conversion. But it is a groundless fear; the indictment against them is not lost. It is satisfied and they may look to God in confidence, saying:

Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back. Isa. 38: 17.

BRIEF NOTES.

A Chicago Journal Publishes the Statement that a citizen who is notoriously of intemperate habits has applied for assistance from one of his tenants from selling liquor on his property. He is resolved that no house belonging to him shall become a saloon. He has not far to go for a proof that the traffic is injurious.

The American Board now has Ninety-two workers including missionaries, native teachers and helpers working in Constantinople, Adrianople and Nicomedia. The work is being much blessed, and the enemies of it are becoming less hostile as they see the improvement in the lives of the converts since their acceptance of Christianity. The educational work conducted by the missionaries is also making excellent progress.

Miss Frances E. Willard Held a Huge Temperance Meeting on September 20th in the Metropolitan Tabernacle London, of which the late Mr. C. H. Spurgeon was pastor. Before leaving she took occasion to emphatically contradict the report that she intended being married.

The Wanderings of Grandma.

GRANDMA BENSON, you are wearing me out. I declare you are enough to try the patience of a saint! Now, do stay here, and keep quiet, and fold your hands on your lap; I don't ask you to do one single thing, grandma! Job Benson and I are willing to take care of you, land knows, but you won't let yourself be took care of. If I had nothing to do but to sit still by the window in summer, and the stove in winter, you wouldn't hear no complaints out of my head, I can tell you!"

Grandma Benson, a meek-looking old lady, with large shining gray eyes, still youthful in expression, though her face was a mass of tiny lines and puckering wrinkles, answered nothing to the stream of her daughter-in-law's eloquence. That was something she heard every day, and that irked her patient soul more and more.

She was very unhappy here with Job's wife. She yearned for her own house, which she had had for fifty years, which her son and daughter had insisted on her leaving, against her will, because, of course, "Mother couldn't live there alone, now that father was dead, and there was no use in paying any one to stay with her, when there was full and plenty in Job's house, and there was a sunny room on the first floor, just off the kitchen, where grandma could have all her old traps, and never need put her foot even on the stairs, or do a hand's turn, but just live like a lady."

The son's wife was an energetic and masterful woman of forty, the son a hard-fisted, grasping farmer, not meaning to be unkind, but with "no nonsense about him." As long as his mother lived, by his father's will, he couldn't sell the old homestead, but he meant to keep it up at the least expense practicable during her life, and to sell it to the railroad company when she should be gone. A tenant was found to work the old place on shares, the widowed mother was kindly but unceremoniously hustled away to a new life in an unfamiliar State, and then Job and his wife felt they had done their whole duty.

"More couldn't be expected of nobody," said Malvine Jane, "but Grandma Benson is the most ongrateful, disagreeable old woman you ever saw. I won't have her fussing around, messing up my tidy kitchen, ain't no need of her doin' it. She is free to do as she's a mind to, if she only won't go wanderin' off, and stoppin' round at the neighbors, tellin' tales."

"She's a little touched here," said the gossipy friend, to whom Job's wife was talking. As she said here, she put a long finger up toward her own forehead. "A little lacking in the upper story; old folks often are, you know."

"Not that we know of," said Malvina Benson. "Her mind's all right. She's only restless, and can't settle down to her Bible and her knitting, as an old lady should. Well, it's a long lane that ain't got no turning, and we wear through everything; give us time."

"Couldn't I make the pandowdy, Vina," asked a plaintive voice, an hour later. "Job always said nobody could make a pandowdy equal to his mother."

"La, no, Grandma Benson," was the brisk reply. "Job got over all that. His wife's cooking suits him just as well as ever his mother's did. You must save your strength. I want to see you in her kitchen."

"Can't I make the starch for you, and won't you let me iron Job's shirts? I'd like to, — was the eager plea on another day.

"Once for all, Grandma Benson, I'll not have you touch my work, any of it, starch, or irons, or anything. Don't bother when I'm flyin' round in a hurry. Keep out of my road, do." This was the answer, cruel, if Malvina had known it, but she wasn't sufficiently sensitive to realize how cruel.

So Grandma took to skipping off, and wandering away, and getting lost. They would find her, "all tuckered out," miles from home, and after Job had several times hitched up, at the end of the day, and scurried over the township to search for his mother, and bring her home, he grew angry and spoke sharply and crossly to the poor old lady, as he would have done to a wilful and perverse child.

He and his wife were both much put about. The latter feared that folks would talk about them. In her experience, nothing was so dreadful as to be talked about by one's townspeople and acquaintances. Perhaps the thing which served her for a conscience, dull and obtuse though it was, told her that she had not tried to make her old mother-in-law happy.

So many of us, friends, are willing to make other people at ease and comfortable in our own way! But we won't budge an inch, or yield a point, to do it in their way! And as for the Lord's way, why, we give that not an atom of thought.

Grandma Benson began to be dreadfully homesick. Bit by bit, under the strain of absence from things familiar and the weariness of enforced idleness, she did grow a little weakened mentally. She developed the cunning of a gentle insanity, and watched for chances to evade Malvina's vigilance.

One Sunday afternoon when her daughter-in-law had stepped around the corner, to visit an acquaintance who had a new baby to show, and Job was snoring sonorously in his after-dinner nap, Grandma tiptoed out of the house in her stocking feet. She had not been well for a week; her head had a queer, dizzy feeling, her limbs quivered. Keeping close to the garden fence and holding fast to the palings, she tottered out into the hushed street, down the green meadow beyond, and over the bridge that spanned the brook.

"I'm coming home," she said, "home to you, Abner." Yes, Cissy, I see you beckoning. How you have grown since you went. Heaven must be a nice place, to make you look so beautiful. It was good of you, Cissy, to come and lead me home to your father. I've been lonesome, and sorrowful, and Job and Malvina, they mean well. I'll tell the folks in heaven they mean well", but now don't understand! They can't understand, somehow!

"One step more, over the river, yes, Cissy, yes, I'm coming. Take my hand, little daughter. Your white dress doesn't touch the waves, you just float above 'em, but I'm clumsy, I must step in, and the river's chill at first. No matter, dear, 'Sweet fields beyond—the swelling flood—stand dressed in living green—' "

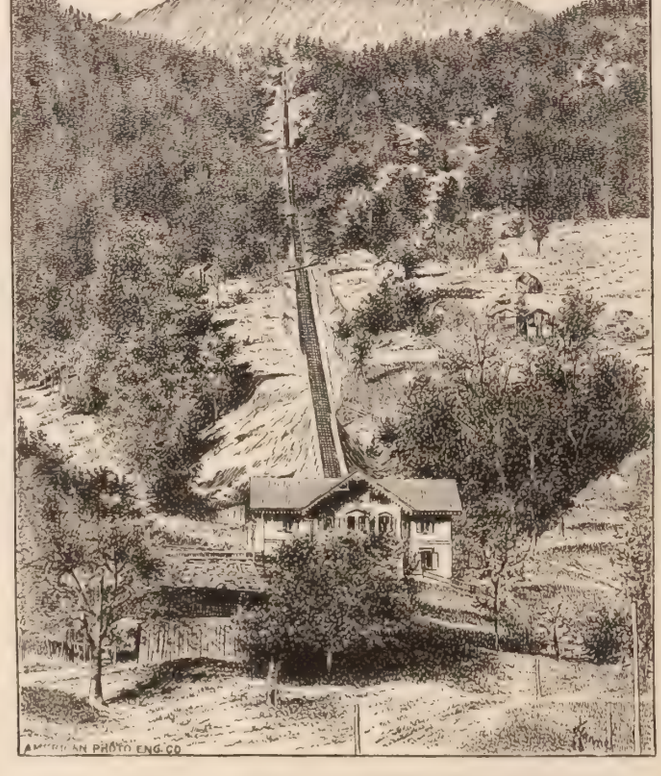
She was walking in the foaming brook. Swept by a recent rain, it was a riotous flood. The waves reached up their arms and gently drew her to their bosom. She sank into their embrace, still seeing that vision of the sweet fields beyond the swelling flood, and Grandma's wanderings were over. She was safe with Cissy and Abner in the Father's house.

When they found her where the waves drifted her into an arc of green turf, willow-shaded, on the bank of the brook, the peace of God was on her quiet face.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Mountain Railroad.

SWITZERLAND has been called "the Playground of Europe." Every summer it is crowded with visitors of all grades and ranks in society, from royalty to tradesman. Queen Margherita of Italy goes to her favorite spot, Gressonay; the King and Queen of Roumania quietly stop at a Swiss village; the two Queens of the Netherlands enjoy the delights of Grindelwald; ex-King Milan and his son, King Alexander of Servia, go to Lucerne; while Grand Dukes and Duchesses without number rest from court functions in the peaceful green valleys of the only European country when politics can be forgotten. Most of their visitors are travelers by the widespread system of the Oberland Railways, which now make accessible peaks and places formerly within the sole reach of the climber. Little engines, with two or three carriages behind them, thread through dangerous passes and attain dizzy heights. The engineering feats which have made these railways possible win from the traveler almost as much astonishment and admiration as the views which he sees while comfortably seated on the train. Our illustration (from the London "Illustrated News"), shows the ascent of one of these steep mountains from the little station of Lauterbrunnen. As the train, bearing its thirty passengers, plods its upward way, the chalets glittering in the valleys below grow insignificant, and the peaks above sublime. An electric railway carries the traveler right up to the gateway of Mu[nch], and then, unwearied with the labo[r] of climbing, he is free to enjoy to the ful[l] the splendor of the scene.



A STEEP MOUNTAIN RAILROAD AT LAUTERBRUNNEN, SWITZERLAND.

Up to January, 1894, there were [20] miles of railway in Switzerland, and [ice] then a substantial addition has been [ma]de. Mountain railways now take travele[rs] to the sombre summit of Pilatus, or t[o] the lesser-known Stanserhorn; and other [ne]s are projected. These enterprises have [be]en accomplished with the least possible s[ca]r of the landscape, and with real c[on]sideration for the beauty of the land th[rou]gh which they run. Every care is tak[en] to ensure safety and constant inspection [is] the rule on all these railways.

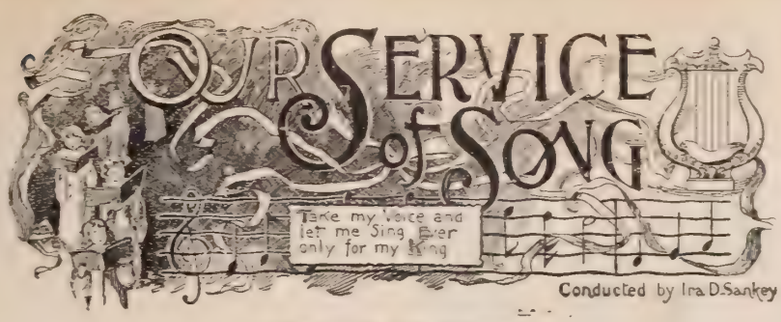
THE DUTY OF HAPPINESS.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the week Beginning Oct. 6. John 15: 11; Psalm 37: 1-11.

TREATING happiness as a duty seems at first sight like the methods adopted by the Christian Scientists for the restoration of health. You are to believe you are well and you will be well. But there is this difference, that the condition of the mind has a much closer relation with happiness than with health. A man may enjoy robust, vigorous health, even when his mind is weak, or corrupt, but he cannot enjoy real happiness unless his mind is strong and pure. External circumstances cannot of themselves give happiness. A discontented, querulous mind will be miserable in spite of all favorable conditions. Ecclesiastes tells the story of an experience which has had its counterpart in many a palace. Pleasure failed to give happiness, learning failed, philosophy failed, politics, business, society, wealth, all failed. "All is vanity," was the sad conclusion reached in every pursuit. Yet the end sought vainly under the circumstances, which by general consent are deemed the most favorable, Christ guarantees without regard to those circumstances. A man may be rich or poor, learned or ignorant, distinguished or obscure; it does not signify what his condition in life may be, he can have not only happiness, but joy, which is the active voice of happiness. The assurance was a bold one, for Christ promised no immunity from the ordinary trials and troubles of life. Indeed, he foresaw that the Christian would have special and peculiar trials in addition to those of the common lot. He could not only have to bear sickness, poverty, and the other ills that flesh is heir to, but as his follower, he would suffer persecution, would have a continuous fight with his lower nature, and would have to practice all the self-denial and renunciation that taking up his cross implied. Yet his joy was to be full. His cup of happiness would be filled to the brim. Truly a wonderful promise! But there was a ground in the very words he used for confidence in his ability to fulfil it. He said it was to come through a power which he had himself tested. "My joy may be in you." Everyone is familiar with this principle of operation. Some great joy comes into a man's life. A fortune is left him; a child is born to him; a beloved one apparently on the verge of death recovers; or a dreaded crisis passes over harmlessly. In the first hours of the enjoyment of the blessing, his spirits rise and all the petty vexations and annoyances of his life fail to disturb his serenity. He laughs at irritations which ordinarily would exasperate him. He is genial, affable, cheerful. The great joy in his heart is an armor that the stings of trouble cannot penetrate. In a few days or weeks, the sense of the changed conditions of his life wears off. Now Christ proposes to make men happy by imparting such joy and making it permanent, renewing it daily and hourly. It is his joy, the joy that carried him through a life that must have been infinitely wearisome and distressing. Without a friend to sympathize, misunderstood even by his most intimate disciples; misrepresented and slandered by his enemies—he must have suffered intensely all through his life. He could not have preached and done his work if he had not been supported by some great joy. This is the joy he promises to impart: "My joy may be in you." He wishes his followers to have it, for their own sakes and for the sake of the world, that others seeing their happiness, may seek it for themselves. Thus we see how happiness may be a duty. He who neglects the offer of this joy which Christ waits to impart, wrongs his own soul and deprives Christianity of the attraction it ought to have for the world.



GEMS FOR HIS CROWN.

W. A. O. W. A. OGDEN.

1. Like gems we may shine in the crown of our King, Re- splendent with glo - ry His prais- es may tell;
2. Like lambs of the fold in His pas-ture be- low, We're fed by His grace ev-ery morning a- new;
3. Like sheep we will fol-low our Shepherd di-vine, Till life and its jour- ney on earth shall be o'er;
Redeemed by His blood, we the glad song may sing, In cho- rus e - ter - nal its numbers shall swell.
De - fend - ed, pro- tect- ed where-ev - er we go, Led on by our Sav-iour and Shepherd so true.
Then raised in His likeness, we ev - er shall shine As stars in His crown, on the bright golden, shore.
Chorus.
We shall shine . . . . in His crown. . . . We shall shine . . . in His crown; . . .
We shall shine in His crown. We shall shine in His crown. in His crown; Thro' His grace, . . . thro' His love . . . . We shall shine in the man- sions a - bove.
thro' His grace, thro' His love,

THE CLUE TO THE VISION.

The Explanation Given by the Angel to Daniel a Clue to the Interpretation of the Later Visions of the Prophet.

BY GEO. A. PEMBER, M.A.*

THE prayer of the prophet Daniel† opened a channel of blessing, and called forth a gracious answer, in which was a masterkey for the elucidation, not only of previous, but even of subsequent revelations. Its enlightening effect upon him may be seen in the first verse of the tenth chapter. For there, when about to relate the most detailed and elaborate of all the Divine communications received by him, he no longer speaks of bewilderment and perplexity, but joyfully announces, that "he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision."

Now, that which was so helpful to Daniel must also be of importance to us: that which furnished him with skill and understanding to comprehend his own visions must also prove a clue for us, if we rightly interpret it. Let us, therefore, give to its four verses (Daniel 9: 24-27) that attention which they demand.

"Seventy Sevens have been severed off upon thy people and upon thy Holy City, to shut up the transgression, and to seal up sins, and to cover iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up vision and prophet, and to anoint a Holy of Holies."

"Seventy Sevens." We prefer to translate literally, since the "weeks" of our versions is liable to be misunderstood. For the Hebrew word does not mean "weeks" in our sense of the term, but simply "sevens;" and whether they be "sevens" of hours, days, months, or years, the context must decide. In the present passage, sevens of years are undoubtedly intended, because, as we learn from the second verse of the chapter, the mind of the prophet was then meditating upon the Seventy Years of captivity foretold by Jeremiah. And, in response to his thoughts, the angel seems to say:—"The Seventy Years of the Captivity will not suffice for the discipline of thy people: they must, therefore, be succeeded by seventy times seventy other years."

We should remember that the Sabbatical years and the great festival of the Jubilee, by which time was divided into what we may call "land-weeks," made the idea of a seven of years almost as familiar to the Hebrews as a seven of days. Moreover, this prophecy is concerned, not only with the people, but also with the City which represents the Land.

"Have been severed off." That is, from the Times of the Gentiles, from the age during which the Four World-empires should hold sway, and with which Daniel was now sufficiently acquainted.

We may, then, sum up the meaning of the words which we have thus far considered as follows. Seventy Sevens—that is to say, Four Hundred and Ninety Years—would be taken by God out of the protracted Times of the Gentiles for special dealings with the Jews in their own Land, apart from the discipline to which they would also be subjected in the Dispersion, when, according to the prophecy of Moses, they would be dwelling in the lands of their enemies.

† Daniel 9: 2. Prof. McPherson shows that the cause of Daniel's perplexity was that the visions he had seen appeared to require a long time for their fulfilment; whereas, from the date of the return from captivity, which he knew was to be referred to, occur within two years. The visions were incomprehensible to him and he was so much distressed by his failing to understand them that he fell sick. He prayed for light and an angel was sent to explain the visions.

AT EVENTIDE.

HE passed a church at eventide,
And from its open door
He heard the organ pealing forth
A tune he loved of yore;
Within, they sang in warmth and light,
Without, all cold stood he.
Listening to these old sweet words—
"Oh Lord, abide with me!'

Within his eyes a mist of tears
Obscured the dirty street,
As in a dream he saw the days
When life was young and sweet:
The cottage 'mid the varied bloom
Of flowers he once held dear,
The dear ones who had passed away
With every passing year.

He saw the old grey village church,
The pastor's kindly smile.
And many an old familiar friend
Passed down the matted aisle.
Then, in that dreary street alone,
He bent his trembling knee,
And cried, "All these have passed away,
Oh Lord, abide with me!'

But strange, and seeming far away,
The well-known verses rang.
Until he could not hear their words
Or follow as they sang:
For, as he raised his weary eyes,
An angel he could see.
Who clasped his trembling hand and said
"I will abide with thee!"

MARGERY BROWNE.

SHEEP AND WOLVES.

PITY, Lord, the crippled poor.
Age and childhood lacking bread;
Thou who all our ills can'st cure,
Had'st not where to lay Thy head;
Lazarus at the rich man's gate
Lift from out his low estate.

Sluggards with their garden wall
Broken through, by weeds o'ergrown,
Rouse to reason's trumpet call:
Man must reap what he has sown.
Famine falls to drones and fools;
Willing hands find fitting tools.

Prodigals with husks for bread
Homeward call to food divine;
Souls in sin and trespass dead,
Raise to life and bliss in Thine:
Lift Thy Cross on land and sea,
Rich are all if one in Thee.

—JOSEPH COOK.

BLESSED, BLESSED LORD!

I LAY all upon thine altar;
Never will I fear nor falter.
Thy sweet will I would not alter:
Blessed, blessed Lord!

CHORUS: Nothing ever can us sever.
Thou wilt leave me never, never;
I am thine and thou art mine,
Forever and forever.

What have I to do with sighing?
What have I to do with crying?
To my own will I am dying;
Blessed, blessed Lord!

In the secret place I'm dwelling;
In my heart thy joys are swelling;
Help me as thy love I'm telling:
Blessed, blessed Lord!

By thy gracious love constraining,
Keep me, Lord, from all complaining;
Thou wilt soon on earth be reigning:
Blessed, blessed Lord!

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

SOZONTIEFF LAID HIS DAUGHTER DOWN AND KNELT BESIDE HER.

CHAPTER XI.

The Quicksands.

SILENCE fell on the two strange creatures. The father motionless but agitated; the daughter almost paralyzed by fear. What dreadful thing was this her father was meditating? She knew not; but furtively watching his face she saw that he was slowly making up his mind to some decisive act.

He murmured to himself, "Was it for Isaac's sins that he was to be offered up? The book does not say. It was to prove Abraham. This is to prove me. But I do not understand. It said, 'Only death will set her free,' and now, 'She shall not die.' I am willing. Where is my land of Moriah? Afar off, or near? The river, the quicksands that is the place of sacrifice, and I believe there will be provided a sacrifice. Substitutes are in the plans of God, and I'll call the quicksands my Jehovah Jireh, because there the Lord will provide a substitute. And as I have not withheld my only daughter, God will bless me and mine, and we shall possess the gate of our enemies, and in our seed shall all Russia be blessed; and I will dwell on some grassy level steppe, perhaps like Beersheba, and my flocks and my herds will be around me, and Nadja's great broad sons will support my declining days, and hand down the pure truth to their children and children's children. Jehovah Jireh! But if he should not provide?"

At the thought a cold sweat broke out on the wretched man's face. It was with pale lips that he continued:

"What if I lose Nadja and no sacrifice is provided? I would be heartbroken." He looked up at the icon and waited. The answer came. Sozontieff speaking as before:

"Kwzma Sozontieff, is this your faith? Is this the faith that will remove mountains? Is this the faith that will bring a blessing? [illegible]"

He sank down on the earthen floor in a heap, and rested his head on the old Bible. The tapers were burning low. The silence in the cottage was terrible. When he rose the tapers had all expired, and only the dim light of the blue lampada flickered in the [illegible]. He turned to Nadja who still reclined in the chair in her deep stupor.

"Nadja, come [illegible]. He spoke brake- [illegible] "The night is wearing to a close. It is after two. I hear the cocks in the village. Rouse thee, child." He gently took her hand, and she sighed deeply, trying to open her eyes, trying also to say something.

He took both her hands in his and chafed them. He opened her eyelids and looked into her eyes. He kissed her forehead. She shivered. "Nadja, Nadja!" he cried.

There was a faint sound outside the "izba" as of some one moving slowly over the sandy gravel.

Nadja heard the sound. She slowly opened her eyes. "Who's that outside, father? There's some one coming!"

"It is nothing, child. It is the wind thou hearest; there is a storm rising."

"Why is it so dark, father, and so cold? Light the lamps. I am afraid. There it is again! Do you hear that? It is at the window. Look!"

She had turned swiftly to the window. Uttering one long penetrating shriek, she fell senseless in her father's arms.

Sozontieff darted a glance at the window. There was a face there for a moment, only for a moment, and then it vanished. But the aspect of that face shook the iron nerves of the man, and he trembled. It was Grisha's face, white, drawn, distorted with passion, with dark, piercing, dreadful eyes.

Sozontieff paused irresolute, but only for a moment. His thoughts were away to those quicksands which he had fixed on as his Moriah—the place where he would emulate Abraham's sublime abnegation.

These quicksands lay close to the river about half a mile above the ferry. They were the special terror of the children who herded the cattle on the river meadowlands in Spring. Many a straying cow and sheep had been engulfed in them, and careful mothers used to exhort their boys to keep clear of them by narrating the true story of how, once upon a time, three lads, who had ventured beyond the grass, had been ruthlessly sucked into the quicksands and had never been heard of again.

It was this desolate and forbidding place that the ferryman, who knew every twist and turn of the broken paths through it, had fixed on as his Moriah, as the place where his daughter was to be offered in sacrifice. It is impossible to say what were the motives actuating Sozontieff in his choice of this spot. Although he was indifferent to the consequences to himself, it must follow, in the event of the sacrifice being accepted, he was probably not averse to a spot for his action which would be free from the observation of others, and inclined to a place where a mode of death might be obtained without a violent laying of hands on his victim. Be this as it may, he determined on the quicksands as the place of sacrifice, and the more he reflected, if his mad processes of thought could be called reflection, the more he felt spurred on to his awful enterprise.

The sight of Grisha's face at the window relaxed his strong nerves, but only momentarily. He knew that his drudge was quite safe, that he neither understood what he might have overheard nor, if questioned, could he relate it intelligently to others. As soon as he obtained control of himself, he opened the door and peered out into the moonlit night calling Grisha. But Grisha did not reply: he had retired into the shade of some trees and was lying on the ground stealthily watching. He lingered a moment longer at the door, looking up at the sky, and gave a swift glance round at the moonlit scene before him. It was cloudy and the wind was rising, blowing in gusts from the river, and now and again great black shadows swept over the land. The ferryman receiving no answer, probably thought that Grisha had gone to lie down in the hayloft, and returned to the prone form of Nadja lying in the huge chair. It was a terrible shock she had received, for she lay there lifeless and inert. Her father peered at her staring eyes in the dark and hurriedly closed them, a nameless, shapeless fear congealing the blood in his veins. He dared not light the lamp, and a gust of wind from the open door had extinguished the lampada.

Nerving himself for what was to follow, he stood before the icon, and made three low obeisances, crossing himself swiftly and repeatedly; then falling on his knees, he touched the earthen floor three times with his forehead, all the while rapidly repeating prayers in Slavonic, and every now and then turning his face suddenly and suspiciously to the window. He knew that the wind was rapidly rising to a tempest, for the casement of door and window and the walls of the frail "izba" rattled and creaked in the blast.

The moon was shining right into the room, lighting up the white, corpse-like face of Nadja.

When Sozontieff rose from his devotions he hurriedly divested himself of his dark caftan, replacing it with a pure white linen garment, round which he wound a white sash. From the long coffer-like bench he took a few pieces of strong cord and a white handkerchief. With the cords he swiftly tied together first the hands and then the feet of his daughter. The handkerchief he stuffed into her mouth as a gag, should she become conscious and cry out. Then turning for the last time to the darkened face of the Wonder-Worker, he prostrated himself again and again: he fell on his knees and touched the earth with his forehead again and again, saying ever fresh prayers which sounded more like a choking gurgle than the words of a man. At last he rose and flinging the unconscious form of the girl over his shoulder, strode out of the door and faced the river.

He sped rapidly along the river-path with his burden, now and then furtively looking to his left and behind him, as though he feared that some one might notice him and follow. He reached the tall reeds, and plunging into their mazes with the security of one who perfectly knows his way, he wound in and out among them ever in the direction of the quicksands.

But the blowing wind and the rapid motion had revived Nadja. She felt herself bound and gagged, and in an agony of terror struggled to free herself. Sozontieff stopped for a moment in the shade of a clump of alders, laid his burden on the ground, adjusted the handkerchief and tightened the cords. But as he raised it again he thought he saw for a moment the dark form of something that might have been a man swiftly moving across the open space behind him to the shelter of the sedge. He concluded that it must be the shadow of a cloud sweeping across the moon. No one could be out there at this time of the night, and he pressed on. He tried to still Nadja, who kept up a monotonous moaning, but she struggled all the more fiercely to be free, cutting herself with the cords in her efforts. Sozontieff grew more and more uneasy. Every few yards he paused and looked behind him, and each time he looked he was aware of the pursuing shadow that paused as he paused, but kept ever gaining on him. "I shall be free of it, if it is human," he thought, "now that I have reached the mud," and picking his way carefully, jumping across dark stagnant pools, whose depth he knew not, and wading carefully across the intersecting streams.

It was a terrible night: the storm had become furious, a whistling, moaning gale sweeping swiftly across the tasselled tops of the reeds. Sozontieff panted hard as he breasted each explosive blast, and more than once he stumbled as though completely exhausted.

He was on the verge of the quicksands. The broad belt of shining white sand lay before him, and beyond that the rush of the dark waters of the rivers, the storm driving the spray from it into his face. The first few yards of sand were dry and firm—beyond it was soaking and seething in ever lasting motion, sucking itself in little bubbles and whirls and eddies, silently, horribly. The ferryman shivered. Nadja felt his limbs shake under him and she struggled all the more, feeling that her only chance of escape lay in exhausting his strength. He laid her down on the hard sand and knelt beside her, holding her firmly. His eyes were riveted on a clump of stunted willows that he had just passed for the haunting shadow that followed him was somewhere there and motionless, and he was meditating whether he should not wait for the fast approaching dawn or return to the clump to discover what that shadow was. But a look at his daughter decided him. Her strength was gone, she lay almost still, she was choking, the blood trickled from her lacerated wrists. He would act at once and see whether she was to be the sacrifice or whether another would be provided.

Slowly, for his own strength was sinking fast, and he tottered as he stood, he raised his daughter with both hands high over his head. He looked down at the moving sand and he quailed, for he thought he heard a stealthy step behind him. His cap had fallen off, and his long grey hair and beard streamed out behind him. Again he raised the girl, gathering all his strength for one final effort, to throw her into the seething mass before him, but the terrible step was close behind him and approaching rapidly. Sozontieff, with a wild yell that was heard far above the roar of the tempest, turned round, and Nadja fell from his unnerved hands. With a spring like a tiger's the approaching figure was on his shoulders, and a long knife was plunged deep into his neck.

He fell like a stone, muttering something. A terrible face, distorted with hate, a misshapen, humped figure bent low to listen to what the dying man was saying, and laughed mockingly, a far more hideous sound amid the storm than the yell of horror that had preceded it.

Like lightning the cords that bound Nadja were cut by the dripping knife, and the handkerchief taken from her mouth. The hunchback then dragged her from the sand on to the grass and fled, fled far over the meadowland and away out on the steppe, never resting until the sun was high in the heavens, and until his limbs worn out with the fearful excitement of the night could carry him no farther.

It was late in the evening when he made his way by devious paths back to the ferryman's "izba," a glorious evening, calm and bright. He was not quite sure whether or not Nadja would receive him kindly, but he fancied she ought, as he had saved her life. He crept cautiously up to the house. The door was closed, which was strange on so fine an evening. Gently opening it he look round, scowling at the icon.

But Nadja was not there. A horrible fear that she was still at the quicksands and unable to move, seized him, perhaps she was lying on the cold grass where he had left her, thirsty, hungry. Hastily putting some bread in his pocket he rushed out of the house and tore madly along the river bank and through the mud to the quicksand.

"Nadja!" he called, "Nadja!" There was no response. She was gone. But there was there, and the long, stained knife beside it. Every fibre of his body thrilled with dread, with a terrible presentiment of coming trouble. Dragging the cold body across to the edge of the quicksands he pushed it in. It slowly sank and the long knife with it.

Grisha looked wildly around him, calling in vain the name of his young mistress, and hearing nothing but the ugly rush and lap of the water, musical no longer; then she distractedly home again through the dark his fingers in his ears to keep out the sounds of a myriad frogs which were croaking out their exultation at his misery.

In Pueblo Homes.

A Typical New Mexican Village—Simple People and Old-Fashioned Ways.

TRAVELERS passing through New Mexico and certain parts of Colorado, soon become accustomed to the sight of little clusters of adobe (or sun-dried brick) dwellings, like those shown in the illustration on this page. It is among the Pueblo Indians, however, that the adobe house is seen in its most perfect state unchanged by modern architectural skill and invention, and built just as other adobe houses have been built probably since a period anterior to the Spanish conquest. The houses are built one upon another, in a succession of terraces, sometimes five or six in number, the upper stories being accessible only by means of ladders. The most noted of these Pueblos are Taos, Laguna, Acoma, Santa Clara, Zuni, and Santo Domingo. In all, the walls of the buildings are very thick, and the interior is reached by entrance-ways cut in the roof, which are reached by ladders.

Ethnologists have pronounced the Pueblo Indians to be the oldest race now living on the American continent. Some hold that they are descended from the Aztecs, whose ancient kingdom of Cibola extended from Colorado and Utah to Central America. In Penal County, Arizona, there are extensive ruins, along the course of the Gila river in what are known as the Casa Grandes, and these are supposed to be all that remains to mark the site of the ancient Montezuma capital. Some of the columns and archways are described as being equal in grandeur and magnificence to any of the ruins found in Egypt's desolated cities. In those underground courts and vast stone pillars the Montezumas are believed to have held their court, in days of which history has never written record. Like that other mysterious race, the cliff-dwellers, the predecessors of the Pueblos have left little behind them by which mankind may form an estimate of the character and extent of their civilization.

The present generation of Pueblos is known as "Village Indians" (village being the English rendering of the Spanish word pueblo). There are nineteen of these villages in New Mexico, and the 8,000 souls who occupy them have an abundance of land upon which they raise maize, wheat, vegetables, fruit, and cotton. They possess large numbers of cattle and live stock of every description, and are usually well-to-do and comfortable, being thrifty and industrious, and with little of the nomadic spirit that is generally a part of the Indian character. Besides being good farmers and law-abiding citizens, they are experts in a number of simple industries, such as spinning, weaving, and the manufacture of pottery. Though usually peaceful, they are brave and courageous when occasion requires any display of military courage or patriotism.

These remnants of a once great race are making promising progress in civilization and Christianity. The Pueblo children of to-day have good schools, and although the pagan beliefs still linger among the parents, the younger generation is being taught in Christian doctrines.

A Little Eskimo Maid.

Every housekeeper who saw thrown on the screen at Mrs. Peary's recent Greenland lectures the three pictures of the Eskimo girl whom she brought from the North to care for the famous Baby Peary, should have taken their object lesson straight home to herself if she needed it. The first showed the girl as she appeared at home in her shapeless fur garments, vermin nests, that Mrs. Peary had described in a few graphic sentences, and it was easy to fancy the bodily condition of the girl whose only acquaintance with water since her birth was as a liquid to drink. Picture No. 2 showed her the day the Falcon sailed for the South; she had been a few weeks then with Mrs. Peary, but on that day put on for the first time the clothing of civilization, a skirt and waist, with laced shoes and stockings. The change was very palpable, but the hair was still rough and scrubby, and the clothing hung on her in clumsy awkwardness. The last picture was of the girl after a winter's residence in Washington, under her mistress's careful surveillance. No one would have recognized the tidy handmaid wearing a chintz frock and white apron, neat shoes on not unshaped feet, a pretty flower-trimmed straw hat hanging over her arm, her short well-kept hair brushed neatly back from a pleasant smiling face, as the uncouth repulsive native of six months before.

Children's Kindness to Animals.

Petty cruelty on the part of a child is a trait which in later life may develop into absolute brutality. As an illustration of an opposite character, this incident is related of the Whittier children—the famous poet and his brother Matthew: "The boys delighted in petting the oxen, which were large ones, and seemed to appreciate all the kindness that was shown them. They were named 'Buck' and 'Old Butler.' On the hill was one oak much larger than all the rest. As the oxen lay chewing their cuds under this tree the boys would often sit on their foreheads and lean on their horns as on an armchair. Whittier secured the love of everything that came under his care.

"'Old Butler' once saved his life by a remarkable exhibition of strength, and what would be called presence of mind if shown by man. One side of Job's Hill is exceedingly steep—too steep for such an unwieldly animal as an ox to descend rapidly in safety. Greenleaf went to the pasture one day with a bag of salt for the cattle, and 'Old Butler' from the brow of the hill recognized him and knew his errand. As the boy was bent over, shaking the salt out of the bag, the ox came down toward him with flying leaps, and his speed was so great that he could not check himself. He would have crushed his young master; but by a supreme effort gathering himself together at the right moment, the noble creature leaped straight out into the air over the head of the boy, and came to the ground far below with a tremendous concussion and without serious injury to himself." Thus was the lad's kindness repaid.

The Toys of Royal Children.

There was held in Paris last year an auction that would be intensely interesting to the children of all countries. The toys that have been used by the royal children of France were sold. A doll less than twelve inches high, dressed in armor of the time of Louis XIII., sold for 615 francs. A thousand francs were paid for a tiny set of carriages carved in wood, with escorts of little wooden soldiers. These were made in the time when Napoleon was First Consul. There was a toy kitchen that was an exact model of those used in the time of Louis XVI., and made at that time. Poor Marie Antoinette's doll, dressed in the original faded brocaded silk, was sold for 1,800 francs. Imagine the joy of the boy who got a clumsy wooden horse, with a broken nose and only three legs, that there is every reason to believe was owned by the great Napoleon when he was a baby! Really it brings the kings and queens of France quite near to know that at some time they really played with dolls and kitchens, and that the great Napoleon, whom we always think of as leading soldiers to victory, or sitting in loneliness on the island of St. Helena, loved a clumsy wooden horse, and probably cried when it lost its legs.

Persistent Children.

Simple as it seems, no doubt, to be uniformly positive in refusing to give a child anything for which he teases, it is not an easy thing to adhere to this rule, unvaryingly, and to do it wisely. And the trouble in the case, writes H. Clay Trumbull, is not with the child, but with the parent. In order to give promptly, to a child's request, an answer that can rightly be insisted upon against all entreaties, a parent must do his thinking before he gives his answer, rather than afterwards. Too often a parent denies a child's request at the start without considering the case in all its bearings; and then, when the child presses his suit, the parent sees reasons for granting it which had not been in his mind before. The child perceives this state of things, and realizes that the question is to be settled by his teasing, rather than by his parent's independent judgment; and that, therefore, teasing is the only means of securing a correct decision in the premises.

Good Manners.

A young man's manners may be likened to the bark of a tree; some barks, like that of the oak, are very rough; some, like that of the birch, are very smooth; but both equally well protect the interior. There is a great difference, however, in this particular, that while Nature provides a bark for every tree according to its kind, every man grows, or may grow, his own bark. Now, while you are growing bark, remember that it is as easy to grow smooth bark as a rough bark, and infinitely more pleasant for those who rub against you.

SILENT HOURS.

AN hour of silence, of restful thought, of abstention from all duties and pleasures as well, of seclusion from the world, is a privilege that has proved helpful and strengthing to many natures. And so it is to children as well as to adults.

A dear little girl, writes Helen B. Seymour, who had spasms of very disagreeable naughtiness, was kept sweet by being put to bed for an hour after dinner each day. The forced rest with her dollies was a tonic not alone for her own nerves, but those of the family as well. In every house the home-maker should have a "mother's hour" near midday, sacred from intrusion. It may be given to books or sleep, only let it be a silent hour. If this oasis were discovered and enjoyed, there would be fewer nervous wrecks and motherless little ones.

School girls, too, should be taught the benefit of being alone. High strung, conscientious students who are crowded with work ought not to be with "the girls" every minute when unemployed. A spin on a wheel, a ride alone on the cars, a fad for gardening, a walk or drive by one's self will refresh and rebuild the gray brain matter better than any comradeship.

And surely society women need the healing powers of silence. The crusade of teas and receptions, the race with concert and lecture and charitable engagements must be stopped now and then, or they will cease from exhaustion. The recreation cannot all be crowded into a summer vacation. Pick it up by the way. An hour in the silence of a church in midweek, alone with God and one's self, is an accessible refuge in the city. Speed the day when all sanctuaries shall be open all the time as havens of rest in the rush of life's thoroughfares.

Bird Homes in the Fall.

One of the most helpful and instructive outdoor studies the young could pursue at this season of the year is that of bird-life. All through the fall, writes Olive Thorne Miller, pretty phases of bird-life may be enjoyed. Little parties of birdling brothers and sisters, going about together, now and then visited by one or both of the elders, but oftener alone, for now they are getting their education in independence. Lovely in their fresh baby dresses, ingenuous in looks, unsophisticated in manners, and charming in their show of affection for each other, these little creatures are most bewitching to watch. Little groups of bluebirds may be found in newly cut meadows; small squads of young hermit thrushes collect in fussy fascinating flocks, on logs and roots under the trees; specked-breasted young catbirds gather in solitary young cherry trees, and kingbird infants sit solemnly side by side on a twig, half the day. An observing eye will notice, a little later, that most birds go about in parties of four or six or more, and if the eye is sharp to detect youth or age, either by development of plumage or by the manners, it will see that they are composed of one pair and their offspring. Next spring the young will set up families of their own.

THE HEN AND HER BROOD.

An Address Delivered in the Dutch Reformed Church, Mott Haven, by Rev. G. Edwin Talmage.

MY text this morning is to be found in Nature, in the barn-yard. The picture at which we will look together is moving and we can hear as well as see it. I will tell you where I found it—in "Pilgrim's Progress." When Christian came to the interpreter's house, as some of you will remember, the interpreter took him around and showed him different rooms with various people and things in them and taught him in that way, just as in the primary school, arithmetic is taught by sticks as well as numbers.

One scene was this, a hen and her little chickens, and as they watched them, they noticed four ways in which the mother called to her brood. Although at first it only sounded like "cluck, cluck." Now we will think that we are looking, too, and I will use words instead of "cluck, cluck," to show what she says to her children.

They are going around the yard, some of them by the fence trying to crawl through, others by the trees picking at the bark, others standing still and looking stupid, and all the time every once in a while the hen says, "I'm here, never fear, I'm here." But look, she is moving around, she has found a beetle or a worm, and now she says, "See here. Something to eat. See here." Thus it goes on all day, but by and by it gets dark and then she calls, "Come here, come here." And you see them all running up to her, getting on her back, under her wings, anywhere so as to be warm and go to sleep. There is one more way in which she might call, there is a hawk or an eagle in the air and she sees it at once, or a fox near by, "Look out, look out!" and they all scurry away into some hiding-place.

"I'm here!" "See here!" "Come here!" "Look out!" This is the picture and it is to teach us a lesson. God, who is our Father in heaven, has four ways of speaking to us. All day long in the sun or clouds, in the rain or snow, in the trees or rocks, in the rivers or ocean, he seems to say—they are so wonderful—"I'm here!"

Morning, noon, and night, when the food is on the table, though father bought it and mother cooked it, yet God gave it, and he says, "See here," and then in the church or Sunday School or at home, when people are around us, or when it is quiet, when we are reading the Bible or praying, he seems to say "come here." "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." "I love you," and we sing "I am so glad that Jesus loves me." Are you? And now to the fourth way. We are doing wrong, we have not obeyed, we do not love Jesus, we are going to do just as we please, and he says, "Look out!"

I said when I began that this was a picture from nature, and so it is. You can all see for yourselves and hear and learn. But I will tell you where you can find it—where John Bunyan found it, in St. Matthew 23: 37: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing."

Now you notice how the chickens seem to know exactly what the hen means by her "cluck, cluck." To us it sounds every time just "cluck, cluck," and nothing more. But the chickens know the difference. One cluck is quieting and reassuring, another is alarming, and causes them to run for protection, and still another beckons them to food. The reason why they understand and we do not is that they have an interest in the hen's words. They know they concern them. Now that is the way it should be with us. Some people do not hear God speaking to them, do not know that he is speaking at all. But if you are attentive you will hear and will understand. That is what Christ says, "he that doeth my Father's will shall know the doctrine." And everyone finds it so. When you are ready to do what God wants you to do, you get to understand him when he speaks to you, in his Word, or in nature, or in any other way. He does speak, and his words are all those four kinds. He provides food, he keeps you in peace, he protects you from harm, and gives you rest. These are four very good things for young people, and I do not know where you can get them except in Christ. You certainly cannot get them in business or in pleasure. You need to listen to him and do as he tells you. God will not force himself on you. You can refuse him if you choose—take the consequences. That was what was done by the people to whom Christ spoke, and the consequence were awful. Do not you refuse. It is worse than suicide to do that.

OUR CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

XIV.—A. A. BICHELL.

WE are indebted to Rev. J. F. Bryan, pastor of the Methodist Protestant Church, of Ellicott City, Md., for the facts of the following story of the life of a Christian worker whose labors God has blessed in many towns of his native State:

A. A. Bichell was born in Baltimore, Md., March 10, 1865. He had the inestimable advantage of being trained by a pious mother. All that Gospel teaching and earnest prayers could do for a child was done for him. If piety were hereditary, the lad would have turned out well. His mother believed the promise, "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." She fulfilled her duty in this respect, but for a long time it seemed as if the promise had failed in her case. Like many another parent, she mourned and her heart sank, as she saw the boy for whom she had pleaded with God turn his face resolutely toward sin. Tender entreaties, solemn warnings, sharp reproofs seemed alike powerless to keep him from the evil. It was a bitter experience; but unhappily a very common one. Some boys have a natural proclivity to wrong-doing, and this boy was one of that class. It was not with him as with others who are weak, and fall a prey to the temptations of evil companions. He was a tempter rather than the tempted. He became a leader in evil courses, resisted his mother's counsels and appeals, and almost broke her heart. The good woman had recourse to prayers, giving her boy into hands stronger than her own, and hoping still against hope. As in so many of these cases the intoxicating cup intensified the youth's evil propensity. Again and again, news of his drunken orgies reached his mother's ears. It seemed as if he were wholly lost.

He had passed his twenty-fourth birthday and there were no signs of any change, except from bad to worse, when one winter evening, early in the year 1890, he was wandering aimlessly through the streets of Baltimore. The sound of music and singing fell on his ear. He was a good singer himself and was fond of music. He stayed to listen and finally entered the building whence the sound proceeded. It was Emory M. E. Church where Rev. B. G. Reid, the pastor was holding revival services. Young Bichell knew all about sermons and appeals to the unconverted. He had been familiar with them from his earliest years. It was the singing he wanted to hear, and he waited for more of it. But the Holy Spirit was there and applied the truth to his heart. A severe struggle followed, first resistance then fear, then intense anxiety, and at last peace in believing. The change was wonderful to the young man himself, but he was in earnest and was anxious to spread the good news. He went down into the slums where he was well known, and there told the simple story of what God had done for his soul. The testimony had its effect leading one and another to seek salvation. During the five years which have since elapsed, Mr. Bichell has continued his efforts as he has had opportunity. Speaking in the open air, in missions and in churches, he has been blessed to the conversion of many souls.

CHRISTIANITY'S GROWTH IN JAPAN.

Dr. M. L. Gordon, one of the oldest missionaries in Japan, declares his belief that the Christian Church in Japan is strong enough to stand alone. "It is firmly entrenched," he said quite recently. "It is the only church that is growing. The other churches are not only making no progress but are in a state of decay. They are contenting themselves with resisting the advance of Christianity and are using all sorts of methods. The anti-foreign feeling and the strong national spirit that has been developed by the war give them good material to work with, and the Buddhist and Shinto priests are largely responsible for the prejudice that exists against foreign teachers and foreign systems of education. The Buddhists have organized associations similar to our Y. M. C. A. in almost every town in the empire. They have established summer schools for the study of Buddhism in every province, and have recently commenced the publication of magazines for the purpose of reaching the reading element of the community. Shintoism is almost exhausted. It has come to mean nothing but patriotism and the worship of the emperor, and with the education of the people it will disappear as a religion."

The progress of Christianity in the country has been wonderful. A report recently issued by the American Board compiled by Rev. J. H. Pettee says that in 1869 there was not in all the land a single Japanese organization for the propagation of Christianity. Now there are nearly 400 Protestant churches, half a dozen Home Missionary societies, 50 Y. M. C. Associations, 57 C.E. societies, 18 Circles of King's Daughters and several Chautauqua circles.

GOSPEL WORK IN OKLAHOMA.

Writing of a recent preaching trip through Oklahoma, Rev. W. G. Puddefoot, Secretary of the Home Missionary Society gives this account of the dedication of church on the frontier:

"The church stood on a hill—nothing else in sight but a blacksmith's shop, open two days in the week, a little grocery, and a onehouse. We went into the grocery, got by a friendly man, and down some stairs, built out of the clay and covered with carpet, into a very large and pleasant room so dug out of the clay. No beds were in sight, almost people here turn them up by the side of the walls. After tea I said to myself there won't be much of a crowd here; but I was wrong again. By eight o'clock saw people coming from all directions. Why, I said, they seem to be coming out of the ground, as I saw their forms individual rising above the horizon. 'Well,' said the man, 'most of them are.' Each person had chairs; and by 8.30 P. M., over three people were there; by nine, over 400; and by 10.30, no less than 500 gathered; many of having to stand outside. Never have I seen people so hungry for the Gospel. Many of the elders had come from Arkansas and other frontier States, their parents originally having been in the East. Almost wept—and so did strong men—as old hymns were sung, and fond memories came up of home and mother. Oh the feeling of these prairie homes, hundreds of them without the common necessaries of life, even such as flour and milk! Men were cutting wood and carrying it twenty miles for fifty cents, and sometimes having to beg it at that. I don't believe there is anywhere more hardship than that of the first settler who literally dies that those who come after him may live.

"We had fifty miles farther to ride to another location—twenty-five miles through a storm so violent that, with houses and tents tight as they could be, it seemed as if a lavy fog was in the room. After feeding horses, getting dinner, and talking with a ragged man, a "preacher," we were in a new county town."

Cure for Kidneys and Bladder.

We are glad to announce to sufferers from kidney and bladder diseases, pain in back, and rheumatism that a new botanic discovery Alkavis, is proving a positive cure for these maladies. Many cures are certainly wonderful, and we advise readers to send name and address to the Church Review Company, 418 Fourth Avenue, New York. They will send you treatment free by mail and paid it costs you nothing.

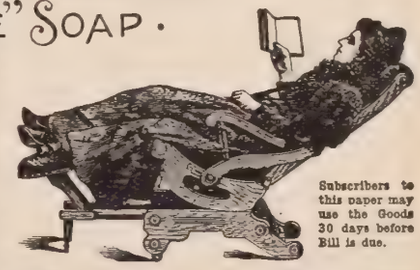
WITH A COMBINATION BOX OF

"SWEET HOME" SOAP.



Subscribers to this paper may use the Goods 30 days before Bill is due.

It can be adjusted to any position, and changed at will by the occupant while reclining. A synonym of luxurious ease and comfort. It is built of oak, polished antique finish, with beautifully grained three-ply veneer back. The seat, head and foot rests are upholstered with silk plush in crimson, old red, tobacco brown, old gold, blue or olive, as desired. It is very strong and perfectly simple in construction. It is fully guaranteed.

Our soaps are sold entirely on their merits, with a guarantee of purity. Thousands use them, and have for many years in every locality, many in your vicinity.

After trial you—the consumer—pay the usual retail value of the Soaps only. All middlemen's profits accrue to you in a valuable premium. The manufacturer alone adds Value; every middleman adds Cost. The Larkin plan saves you half the cost—saves you half the regular retail prices. Thousands of readers of this paper know these facts.

Many people prefer to send cash with order—it is not asked—but if you remit in advance, you will receive in addition to all extras named, a nice present for the lady of the house, and shipment day after order is received. Your money will be refunded without argument or comment if the Box or Chair does not prove all expected. We guarantee the safe delivery of all goods.

MY TEACHER.

I'D have the Preacher preach to me,
The Christ, the Christ of Calvary:
Tell it unto me, how it can be
That he himself hath died for me.
This mystery to my soul reveal,
That I before that Christ may kneel,
And kneeling there, divinely swear,
I'll nothing know, while here below,
But that same Christ who loves me so.

10 Dollars for 3.50

..IF YOU BUY NOW..

A Ten-Dollar set of Shakspeare for $3.50. We mean exactly what we say. This set is worth $10.00 to any reader, no matter how many other editions he may have. We shall sell it direct for a short time only at $3.50, and any one who is dissatisfied may have his money back. These books can never be bought any cheaper. Never as cheap again. In our next announcement the price will be advanced. (The regular price of the set is $10.00.)

This is a Shakspeare for readers. It is the only edition printed in large type. It is strongly bound in good serviceable cloth binding, in eight handsome volumes of easily handleable size. Paper specially made with a dead surface, restful to the eyes. There are copious notes on the text by J. Payne Collier, F. S. A., the celebrated Shakspearian critic, with variorum readings. We honestly believe it to be the best edition ever printed for actual use. We published it to retail at $10. That allowed for the retailer's and the jobber's profit. The reader buying direct from us can have both of these profits. We can't afford to sell very long at $3.50, which is less than the wholesale price. The object of this special $3.50 offer is to make a quick test of whether the discriminating readers of this paper, who will appreciate a large, clear type, scholarly edition of Shakspeare, complete, are ready to buy direct from the manufacturers at a saving of more than half the cost. If you are, the middle-men's profit is yours. Order to-day and be sure of getting the lowest price that will ever be quoted.

TWO OPINIONS. HUNDREDS MORE LIKE THEM.

ROCKPORT, MAINE.
KEYSTONE PUBLISHING CO.,
Gentlemen:—I am highly pleased with your ten-dollar edition of Shakspeare. It is just what I have been looking for for several years past. The type is large, clear and plain, the volumes of convenient size, and the annotations helpful. I can cheerfully recommend it to any lover of Shakspeare, and especially to men of my age whose eyesight begins to fail.
I thank you for having placed such an edition on the market, at a price within the reach of the poorest of us.
Very truly yours,
C. F. RICHARDS,
Treasurer Camden Savings Bank,
Rockport, Maine.

NEWINGTON, N. H.
KEYSTONE PUBLISHING CO.,
Gentlemen:—I have received and examined the eight-volume set of Shakspeare which you shipped me. I am agreeably surprised at the attractiveness of the binding and the clearness of the type. The size of the volumes is very convenient and particularly adapted for use in Shakspeare Clubs. I have shown my set to two members of the Newington Club. I will ask you as a favor to ship me by express two more sets of your $10.00 edition of Shakspeare, for which you will find money order enclosed. I consider them wonderfully cheap at the price you are advertising them, and heartily recommend them to any one who may desire to own a beautiful set of Shakspeare's works.
Yours truly, FLORENCE HOYT.

Remember—the regular $10 set in eight handsome volumes (only large-type edition) for $3.50; with the distinct understanding that the money will be returned immediately if you are not satisfied.

What do You Think of This!

TIME speeds on—before you realize it Christmas is at hand and the worry of selecting gifts begins. An inexpensive gift that will give pleasure and be of utility and at the same time suggest appropriateness is one the most difficult problems that confronts at holiday times. The trouble is we put off too long. Nothing seems to suggest itself as "just the thing" and thus the important duty of selecting our gifts is left till the last minute and one must then "take what is left." The readers of The Christian Herald should not be of the dilly-dally sort. The World's Fair souvenir spoons are just the thing. And as bridal or birthday gifts it would be a hard matter to find another gift so pleasing to the donor, at such a small price. One lady writes:

STAUNTON, VA., June 27, 1895.

Leonard Mfg. Co., Chicago.

Gentlemen:—I received the spoons O. K. and am more than pleased with them. I am delighted.

I presented one set as a bridal present and they attracted more attention and admiration than any of the other presents.

I enclosed please find postoffice order for the amount $6.00 for which you will please forward six sets of your "World's Fair souvenir spoons and the cake basket which you offer as premium for same. Yours truly, Leonard Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs:—Enclosed find postoffice money order for $11.88 which please send me the 12 sets of souvenir spoons and premium.

The set I received yesterday are pronounced excellent.

DESCRIPTION OF SOUVENIR SPOONS.

They are standard after-dinner coffee size, heavily coin silver plated, with gold plated bowls, each spoon has a different World's Fair building exquisitely engraved in the bowl, and the handles are finely chased, showing a raised bust of Christopher Columbus with the dates 1492-1893, and the World's Fair City. The set is packed in an elegant plush lined case. The entire set is sent prepaid for 99 cents, and if not perfectly satisfactory your money will be refunded

A SOLVENT FOR CALCULI IN THE BLADDER.

Its Value in Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, the Gouty Diathesis, &c.

Dr. William A. Hammond, Washington, D. C., Surgeon-General U. S. Army (retired), formerly Professor of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of New York, etc.

"I have for some time made use of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in cases of affections of the Nervous System, complicated with Bright's Disease of the Kidneys or with a Gouty Diathesis. The results have been eminently satisfactory. Lithia has for many years been a favorite remedy with me in like cases, but the Buffalo Water certainly acts better than any extemporaneous solution of the Lithia Salts, and is, moreover, better borne by the stomach. I also often prescribe it in those cases of Cerebral Hyperæmia resulting from over mental work—in which the condition called Nervous Dyspepsia exists—and generally with marked benefit, and as a matter of prime importance it is not to be forgotten that the composition of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is such, and the experience of its use so complete, that no doubt exists of its great power, not only as a solvent for calculi already in the bladder, but of the diseases of such calculi existing in the blood."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

Great Special Offer
For a Limited Time Only

Thousands of doctors, lawyers, clergymen, business men, teachers, scholars, and parents, as well as thousands of other readers of this paper, have requested us to make a special offer, for a limited time, on our great standard dictionary and encyclopedia of the world's knowledge. We have decided to do so simply as a means of advertising this great storehouse of information. We do not expect to make money by this offer, as the very low price and extremely liberal terms offered, but little more than pays for paper, printing, and binding; but the tremendous amount of talk created will help to advertise this most modren and up-to-date home reference library. Believing the readers of this paper are intelligent, well-meaning, and trustworthy, we do not hesitate in placing before them the greatest bargain ever offered, and on such easy terms that any one who can afford an investment of 7 cents per day, can take advantage of it.

Adopted as a text-book by many schools and colleges!

No business or professional man, housewife, teacher, student, young or old, prosperous or otherwise, or any one else who wishes to keep abreast of the times, or who is interested in the laudable enterprise of self-education, can afford to allow this rare opportunity to pass by without very careful investigation. Understand this great work embodies all the features of a complete dictionary, and a thorough encyclopedia. The new, and entirely up to the times the regular price of which is from $42 to $70, is now offered all readers of this paper for the insignificant sum of 7 cents per day, in monthly payments of $2 each, until the sum of $16 is paid. This is but little more than one-third the regular price of the four magnificent volumes as represented in the picture. The greatest of all dictionaries and encyclopedias was edited by such world-renowned scholars as

Dr. Robt. Hunter, A.M., F.G.S., Professors Huxley, Morris, Herrtage, Estoclet, Williams, etc., assisted by scores of other specialists in various branches of knowledge.

Over $750,000 required to produre this Magnificent Monument of Educatio

It is a Complete Dictionary of the English language. Every word is exhaustively treated as to origin, history, development, etymology, pronunciation, and various other meanings.*

It is a thorough Encyclopedia of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, agriculture, physics, philosophy, mechanics, history, mythology, biblical knowledge, etc.*

The above illustration is an exact reproduction of the four magnificent volumes of THE ENCYCLOPEDIC DICTIONARY. They are bound in rich, silk cloth, with gilt back stamp, handsomely embossed sides, and marbled edges. Each volume 9 inches wide, 11 1-2 inches long, 3 inches thick. Contains 5,357 pages. 3,000 illustrations. Weight about 40 pounds.

It is a Super Library Book substantially bound printed from plates, in large, clear type, on heavy white paper, and illustrated with thousands of new pictures made especially for this work

It is better than all other dictionaries, because the latest edition of Worcester contains but 116,000 words and 2,126 pages; the latest Webster contains but 140,000 words and 2,011 pages; the Standard contains but a little over 200,000 words and 2,318 pages, and even The Century contains but 225,000 words and sells for $60 to $100. Encyclopedias of various kinds sell for $30 to $200. The great ENCYCLOPEDIC DICTIONARY containing 5,357 pages, over 3,000 illustrations, bound in the handsome volume has over 250,000 words, 50,000 encyclopedic subjects, and is sold on such easy terms that everybody can buy it without financial inconvenience.

Accepted Authority wherever the English Language is Spoken

DON'T FORGET

This special offer holds good for a short time only. The price will be gradually increased until it reaches $42 to $70 per set, and no discounts will then be allowed. It is not for sale in bookstores, and can only be obtained from us or our authorized representatives.

What Good Judges Say about the Work

I prize highly The Encyclopædic Dictionary for the number of words it contains; for accuracy of definitions, for fullness of illustrations, and for encyclopedic comprehensiveness. Bishop Samuel Fallows, Chicago, Ill.

The Encyclopædic Dictionary opens the dictionary which may involve the Century, the Standard, the International. New York World.

Has many distinctive claims to superiority. Such a work has long been needed by the business man, the active student, and in the home circle.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

I consider The Encyclopædic Dictionary superior to Webster, Worcester, Century, or Standard. For busy lawyer who wants to know things quickly, no better reference book could be had.
Benjamin F. Hughes,
Attorney and ex-State Senator Philadelphia.

I have examined The Encyclopædic Dictionary and am much pleased with it. It is valuable as a dictionary and as a work of reference. It is copious and yet concise. In all respects it is a work that every student should possess. George T. Werts, Governor State of New Jersey.

I have Webster, Worcester, and the Century, for encyclopædias I have the Britannica and Appleton's. It is but simple truth to say that The Encyclopædic Dictionary is a magnificent substitute for all of them. J. H. Atwood, Attorney, Leavenworth, Kan.

ARMENIA'S CRY FOR HELP.

"The Christian Herald" Sends a Commissioner to Co-operate with the Missionaries in Organizing a Relief Movement—Mr. W. W. Howard Dispatched to Van—An Opportunity for Christian America to Lead in a Noble Work of Rescue.

ARMENIAN REFUGEES BEGGING AT VAN.

IN response to urgent and repeated appeals from many friends throughout the United States, and obedient to what is clearly a call to further service, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has undertaken, with the co-operation of its generous and sympathetic readers, to extend such aid as may be practicable to the homeless and destitute Christian people of Armenia. Our readers are already aware, from the facts previously published in these columns, of the terrible condition of the peasant population of several provinces in Turkish Armenia. If there lingered in their minds a single doubt as to the real need of that unfortunate race, it will be dispelled by reading the startling account by Mr. W. W. Howard, published below. The writer, who recently passed through Armenia, speaks from personal knowledge of the facts, and without a syllable of exaggeration. He has been commissioned by the proprietor of this journal to revisit that country, and to organize at Van a Missionary Committee of Relief, for the purpose of extending to the utterly helpless and homeless Armenian families of Moush, Shadakh, Bitlis, and neighboring villages such aid as may be needed to save them from perishing of starvation and exposure—an impending fate that threatens thousands during the coming winter.

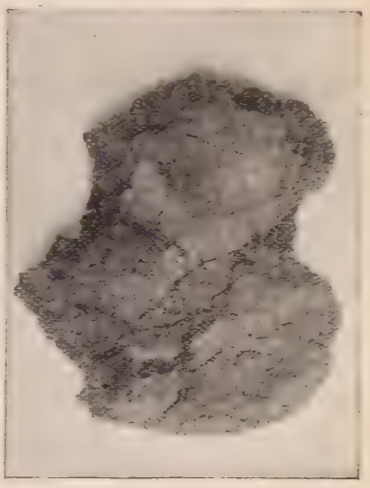
We invite the cordial and prompt co-operation of all our readers in this humane work, which though coming unsought, is none the less urgent and imperative. Never have they bestirred themselves in a worthier cause. We feel assured that when the mothers and fathers and sons and daughters among our circle of friends, fully comprehend the nature of the case, they will exert every energy to make the movement one that will reflect credit upon the generosity of Christian America, and bring a blessing to multitudes. No offering, however small, will be despised, and every contribution consecrated to this work will find prompt acknowledgment in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Howard tells his story without embellishment, and it should be read everywhere throughout Christendom. He writes:

As I have just returned from the interior of the devastated region of Armenia, I have been asked to give to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a true picture of the actual condition of that distressed country. The English language is impotent for the task, and a just regard for the conventionalities of civilized speech will not permit that the whole truth be told. The refined Christian mind can understand wickedness and iniquity up to a certain point, but beyond that point, it either refuses to believe, or it is incapable of receiving additional impressions.

There are in Armenia at the present moment at least two hundred thousand persons fighting a death fight with famine! In the one province of Van, which is the centre of Armenia, there are fully one hundred thousand persons, out of a total Armenian population of 145,000, in actual want of food.

Many have already died of starvation, and thousands of villagers are barely keeping soul and body together by eating roots and herbs and a sort of bread made of clover seed, flax or linseed meal, mixed with edible grass. I have brought to peaceful, prosperous America specimen loaves of this hunger-bread. Starving villagers, reduced to the verge of despair, are crowding into the cities to beg for food and work. Three thousand unwilling beggars walk the streets of the city of Van, like spectres of famine, asking bread from door to door, who six months ago were comparatively prosperous. Others, too proud to beg, but in as desperate condition, crouch in their ruined homes, waiting for a merciful death to end their sufferings.



PIECE OF A LOAF OF HUNGER-BREAD.

Photographed by Mr. Howard from the specimens he brought from Armenia, and now in the possession of "The Christian Herald."

These are not hallucinations on my part, but are things which I myself have lately seen with my own eyes. Unless these wretched people receive immediate help, they will perish of starvation. They must have food and clothing or they cannot possibly survive the winter. They are now living on roots and herbs and edible grass, together with this terrible hunger-bread, the mere odor of which is enough to make a strong man shudder; but when winter begins, in October, the supply of edible grass and roots and herbs will be cut off. What will become of them then?

The Armenians have no wheat, and no money with which to buy food. The Kurds and the Turks have taken everything, and the Armenians have nothing.

The Armenians planted only half a crop this year, owing to the persecutions and exactions which beset them on all sides. In the early summer, when the young grain was green, the Kurds pastured their buffalos and their cattle in the growing wheat. Much of the crop was thus destroyed. Later, when that which remained of the wheat was ready for the harvest, the Kurds came down, cut off the heads of the ripened grain, and left the worthless stubble for the Armenians to live upon during the long and bitter winter. Even a persecuted Armenian cannot hope to maintain his family on wheat straw.

One of the very worst things that can be done to an Armenian is to make a mock at his religion, or to defile his churches. On leaving Armenia recently, I had an authenticated list of seventeen churches and monasteries that had been seized and confiscated by the Kurds, in one district alone in the province of Van. Most of these holy places

CHRISTIAN STRATAGEM.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Judges 7: 20, 21, "And the three companies blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands to blow withal. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp, and all the host ran, and cried, and fled."

THAT is the strangest battle ever fought. God had told Gideon to go down and thrash the Midianites, but his army is too large; for the glory must be given to God, and not to man. And so proclamation is made that all those of the troops who are cowardly, and want to go home, may go; and twenty-two thousand of them scampered away, leaving only ten thousand men. But God says the army is too large yet; and so he orders these ten thousand remaining to march down through a stream, and commands Gideon to notice in what manner these men drink of the water as they pass through it. If they get down on all-fours and drink, then they are to be pronounced lazy and incompetent for the campaign; but if, in passing through the stream, they scoop up the water in the palm of their hand and drink, and pass on, they are to be the men selected for the battle. Well, the ten thousand men marched down in the stream, and the most of them come down on all-fours, and plunge their mouths, like a horse or an ox, into the water and drink; but there are three hundred men who, instead of stooping, just dip the palm of their hands in the water and bring it to their lips, "lapping it as a dog lappeth." Those three hundred brisk, rapid, enthusiastic men are chosen for the campaign. They are each to take a trumpet in the right hand and a pitcher in the left hand, and a lamp inside the pitcher, and then at a given signal they are to blow the trumpets, and throw down the pitchers, and hold up the lamps. So it was done.

It is night. I see a great host of Midianites, sound asleep in the valley of Jezreel. Gideon comes up with his three hundred picked men, and when everything is ready, the signal is given, and they blow the trumpets, and they throw down the pitchers, and hold up the lamps, and the great host of Midianites, waking out of a sound sleep, take the crash of the crockery and the glare of the lamps for the coming on of an overwhelming foe; and they run, and cut themselves to pieces, and horribly perish.

The lessons of this subject are very spirited and impressive. This seemingly valueless lump of quartz has the pure gold in it. The smallest dew-drop on the meadow at night has a star sleeping in its bosom, and the most insignificant passage of Scripture has in it a shining truth. God's mint coins no small change.

I learn in the first place, from this subject, the lawfulness of Christian stratagem. You know very well that the greatest victories ever gained by Washington or Napoleon were gained through the fact that they came when, and in a way they were not expected—sometimes falling back to draw out the foe, sometimes breaking out from ambush, sometimes crossing a river on unheard-of rafts; all the time keeping the opposing forces in wonderment as to what would be done next.

You all know what strategy is in military affairs. Now I think it is high time we had this art sanctified and spiritualized. In the Church, when we are about to make a Christian assault, we send word to the opposing force when we expect to come, how many troops we have, and how many rounds of shot, and whether we will come with artillery, infantry, or cavalry, and of course we are defeated. There are thousands of men who might be surprised into the kingdom of God. We need more tact and ingenuity in Christian work. It is in spiritual affairs as in military, that success depends in attacking that part of the castle which is not armed and intrenched.

For instance, here is a man all armed on the doctrine of election; all his troops of argument and prejudice are at that particular gate. You may batter away at that side of the castle for fifty years and you will not take it; but just wheel your troops to the side gate of the heart's affections, and in five minutes you capture him. I never knew a man to be saved through a brilliant argument. You cannot hook men into the kingdom of God by the horns of a dilemma. There is no grace in syllogisms. Here is a man armed on the subject of perseverance of the saints; he does not believe in it. Attack him at that point, and he will persevere to the very last in not believing it. Here is a man armed on the subject of baptism; he believes in sprinkling or immersion. All your discussion of ecclesiastical hydropathy will not change him. I remember, when I was a boy, that with other boys I went into the river on a summer day to bathe, and we used to dash water on each other, but never got any result except that our eyes were blinded; and all this splashing of water between Baptists and Pedo-baptists never results in anything but the blurring of the spiritual eye-sight. In other words you can never capture a man's soul at the point at which he is especially intrenched. But there is in every man's heart a bolt that can be easily shoved. A little child four years old may touch that bolt, and it will spring back, and the door will swing open, and Christ will come in.

I think that the finest of all the fine arts is the art of doing good, and yet this art is the least cultured. We have in the kingdom of God to-day enough troops to conquer the whole earth for Christ if we only had skillful manœuvering. I would rather have the three hundred lamps and pitchers of Christian stratagem than one hundred thousand drawn swords of literary and ecclesiastical combat.

I learn from this subject, also, that a small part of the army of God will have to do all the hard fighting. Gideon's army was originally composed of thirty-two thousand men, but they went off until there were only ten thousand left, and that was subtracted from until there were only three hundred. It is the same in all ages of the Christian Church; a few men have to do the hard fighting. Take a membership of a thousand, and you generally find that fifty people do the work. Take a membership of five hundred, and you generally find that ten people do the work. There are scores of churches where two or three people do the work.

We mourn that there is so much useless lumber in the mountains of Lebanon. I think, of the ten million membership of the Christian Church to-day, if five millions of the names were off the books, the Church would be stronger. You know that the more cowards and drones there are in any army the weaker it is. I would rather have the three hundred picked men of Gideon than the twenty-two thousand unsifted host. How many Christians there are standing in the way of all progress! I think it is the duty of the Church of God to ride over them, and the quicker it does it, the quicker it does its duty.

Do not worry, oh Christian, if you have to do more than your share of the work. You had better thank God that he has called you to be one of the picked men, rather than to belong to the host of stragglers. Would not you rather be one of the three hundred that fight, than the twenty-two thousand that run? I suppose those cowardly Gideonites who went off congratulated themselves. They said, "We got rid of all that fighting, did not we? How lucky we have been; that battle costs us nothing at all." But they got none of the spoils of the victory. After the battle the three hundred men went down and took the wealth of the Midianites, and out of the cups and platters of their enemies they feasted. And the time will come my dear brethren, when the hosts of darkness will be routed, and Christ will say to his troops, "Well done, my brave men, go up and take the spoils! Be more than conquerors forever!" and in that day all deserters will be shot!

Again: I learn from this subject, that God's way is different from man's, but is always the best way. If we had the planning of that battle, we would have taken those thirty-two thousand men that originally belonged to the army, and we would have drilled them, and marched them up and down by the day, and week, and month, and we would have had them equipped with swords or spears, according to the way of arming in those times; and then we would have marched them down in solid column upon the foe. But that is not the way. God depletes the army, and takes away all their weapons, and gives them a lamp, and a pitcher, and a trumpet, and tells them to go down and drive out the Midianites. I suppose some wiseacres were there who said, "That is not military tactics. The idea of three hundred men, unarmed, conquering such a great host of Midianites!" It was the best way. What sword, spear, or cannon ever accomplished such a victory as the lamp, pitcher, and trumpet?

God's way is different from man's way, but it is always best! Take, for instance, the composition of the Bible. If we had had the writing of the Bible, we would have said, "Let one man write it. If you have twenty or thirty men to write a poem, or make a statute, or write a history, or make an argument, there will be flaws and contradictions." But God says, "Let not one man do it, but forty men shall do it." And they did, differing enough to show there had been no collusion between them, but not contradicting each other on any important point, while they all wrote from their own stand-point and temperament; so that the matter-of-fact man has his Moses; the romantic nature his Ezekiel; the epigrammatic his Solomon; the warrior his Joshua; the sailor his Jonah; the loving his John; the logician his Paul. Instead of this Bible, which now I can lift in my hand—instead of the Bible the child can carry to Sunday School—instead of the little Bible the sailor can put in his jacket when he goes to sea—if it had been left to men to write, it would have been a thousand volumes, judging from the amount of ecclesiastical controversy which has arisen. God's way is different from man's, but it is best, infinitely best.

So it is in regard to the Christian's life. If we had had the planning of a Christian's l we would have said, "Let him have eig years of sunshine, a fine house to live i let his surroundings all be agreeable; l him have sound health; let no chill sh r through his limbs, no pain ache his br , or trouble shadow his soul." I enjoy e prosperity of others so much, I would t every man have as much money as e wants, and roses for his children's chee , and fountains of gladness glancing in t r large round eyes. But that is not G s way. It seems as if man must be cut, d hit, and pounded just in proportion as e is useful. His child falls from a third-s y window, and has its life dashed out; is most confident investment tumbles him to bankruptcy; his friends, on whom he depended, aid the natural force of gravita n in taking him down; his life is a Bull n defeat. Instead of twenty-two thous d advantages, he has only ten thousand— , only three hundred—ay, none at all. I w many good people there are at their s' end about their livelihood, about r reputation. But they will find out it is e best way after awhile; God will s w them that he depletes their advantages st for the same reason he depleted the a y of Gideon—that they may be induce to throw themselves on his mercy.

A grape-vine says in the early sp g, "How glad I am to get through the wi r I shall have no more trouble now! Sum r weather will come and the garden wi e very beautiful!" But the gardener co s, and cuts the vine here and there with is knife. The twigs begin to fall, and e grape-vine cries out, "Murder! wha re you cutting me for?" "Ah," says e gardener, "I don't mean to kill you. I did not do this you would be the laugh g stock of all the other vines before the s on is over." Months go on, and one a the gardener comes under the trellis, w re great clusters of grapes hang, and e grape-vine says, "Thank you, sir; you could not have done anything so kin as to have cut me with that knife." "W m the Lord loveth he chasteneth." No p ning, no grapes; no grinding-mill, no f r; no battle, no victory; no cross, no cro n.

So God's way, in the redemption o he world, is different from ours. If we ha ur way, we would have had Jesus stand i he door of heaven and beckon the nation up to light, or we would have had angels f ng around the earth proclaiming the unse h able riches of Christ. Why is it tha he cause goes on so slowly? Why is it hat the chains stay on, when God could k ck them off? Why do thrones of despo m stand, when God could so easily dem sh them? It is his way, in order that all n erations may co-operate, and that all en may know they cannot do the work t m selves. Just in proportion as these pa mids of sin go up in height will they ne down in ghastliness of ruin.

Oh, thou father of all iniquity! If ou canst hear my voice above the crackli of the flames, drive on thy projects, disp ch thy emissaries, build thy temples, and ge thy chains; but know that thy fall om heaven was not greater than thy hal overthrow shall be when thou sha be driven disarmed into thy fiery den; nd for every lie thou hast framed upon th thou shalt have an additional hell of ry poured into thine anguish by the vengeance of our God; and all heaven shall sho at the overthrow, as from the ransomed th the song breaks through the skies, "H le-lujah! for the Lord God Omnipot reigneth! Hallelujah! for the kingd s of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ!" God's w in the composition of the Bible, God's wa in the Christian's life, God's way in the redemption of the world, God's way in ev thing—different from man's way, but he best.

I learn from this subject, that the ter throw of God's enemies will be sudden nd terrific. There is the army of the Midia tes down in the valley of Jezreel. I suppose their mighty men are dreaming of vict y.

ount Gilboa never stood sentinel for so rge a host. The spears and the shields of e Midianites gleam in the moonlight, and ance on the eye of the Israelites, who over like a battle of eagles, ready to voop from the cliff. Sleep on, oh army of e Midianites! With the night to hide em, and the mountain to guard them, and rong arms to defend them, let no slum- ering foeman dream of disaster! Peace to e captains and the spearmen!

Crash go the pitchers! up flare the mps! To the moun- ins! fly! fly! Troop nning against troop, ousands trampling upon ousands. Hark to the ream and groan of the nted foe, with the Lord d Almighty after them! ow sudden the onset, how ild the consternation, w utter the defeat! I do t care so much what is gainst me, if God is not. ou want a better sword carbine than I have ever en to go out and fight gainst the Lord omnipo- nt. Give me God for y ally, and you may ave all the battlements d battalions.

I saw the defrauder in s splendid house. seemed as if he had conquered God, as e stood amidst the blaze of chandeliers d pier mirrors. In the diamonds of the ardrobe I saw the tears of the widows hom he had robbed, and in the snowy tin the pallor of the white-cheeked or- nans whom he had wronged. The blood the oppressed glowed in the deep crim- n of the imported chair. The music embled with the sorrow of unrequited toil. ut the wave of mirth dashed higher on efs of coral and pearl. The days and the ghts went merrily. No sick child dared ll that silver door-bell. No beggar dared t on that marble step. No voice of prayer ated amidst that tapestry. No shadow a judgment-day darkened that fresco. o tear of human sympathy dropped upon at upholstery. Pomp strutted the hall, nd Dissipation filled her cup, and all emed safe as the Midianites in the valley Jezreel. But God came. Calamity note the money market. The partridge ft its eggs unhatched. Crash went all e porcelain pitchers! Ruin, rout, dis- ay, and woe in the valley of Jezreel!

Alas for those who fight against God! Only two sides. Man immortal, which ide are you on? Woman immortal, which ide are you on? Do you belong to the ree hundred that are going to win the ay, or to the great host of Midianites sleep in the valley, only to be roused up consternation and ruin? Suddenly the olden bowl of life will be broken, and the rumpet blown that will startle our sbul in- eternity. The day of the Lord cometh s a thief in the night, and as the God- rmed Israelites upon the sleeping foe. Ha! Canst thou pluck up courage for the day when the trumpet which hath never been down shall speak the roll-call of the dead, nd the earth, dashing against a lost me- eor, have its mountains scattered to the tars, and oceans emptied in the air? Oh, hen, what will become of you? What will become of me?

If those Midianites had only given up heir swords the day before the disaster, all would have been well; and if you will now surrender the sins with which you have been fighting against God, you will be safe. Oh, make peace with him now, through Jesus Christ our Lord. With the clutch of a drowning man seize the Cross. Oh, surrender! surrender! Christ, with his hand on his pierced side, asks you to.

Church Building in Africa.

How Native Christians among the Barotse in Southern Africa Gladden the Missionary's Heart.

AMONG the discouragements of the missionary's life there come days of gladness which reward him for expatriation, toil and hardship. Such a day is that when the number of the converts made by God's blessing on his labors has grown so large as to warrant the erection of a church building. The first is generally a rude affair, put up by the natives, the missionary working as architect and master-builder; but it is a house consecrated to God, in which the Gospel of Jesus Christ will be preached. That alone is sufficient to glorify it in the missionary's eyes and to make it an edifice dearer to his heart than the most magnificent cathedral in Christendom. M. F. Coillard of the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society who is laboring among the Barotse, on the Upper Zambesi in Southern Africa, has taken a photograph of one of these delightful scenes, which we reproduce on this page. The Society has been on the ground only nine years and it is an eloquent testimony to the earnestness and devotion with which its missionaries must have worked, that a church building should now be erected. The same Society has conducted a successful mission work among the Kabyles, one of the Berber tribes in North-west Africa. It has also missionaries in Senegambia, in China and Tahiti. Recently it began labor in the French territories on the Ogove and Congo Rivers.

ROUGH QUARTERS FOR A MISSIONARY'S WIFE.

Dr. James Johnston, who visited M. Coillard's station in December, 1891, says: "I shall never forget the time spent with this veteran missionary. If I have seen one station that, more than another, deserves the full sympathy and hearty support of Christians at home, it is the one conducted by Francis Coillard. It is fully equipped with every appliance for instructing the natives, not only in divine things, but also how to improve their social condition." M. Coillard has labored with almost apostolic devotion and at the time Dr. Johnston visited him was almost discouraged. Apparently there had been but little result from his work. The Barotse were dull and spiritless and almost incapable of understanding the simplest Gospel teaching. They would listen to M. Coillard quietly and respectfully, but that was all. Doubtless, he was at that time on the verge of a harvest of souls. If the natives had remained in the condition they were in when Dr. Johnston visited the station, such a church as that depicted in our illustration would not have been needed. Such men as he, aided by their devoted wives are pioneers who realize that they must toil in faith and hold fast to the promise that God's message will not return void. M. Coillard has sacrificed much to go there and during his residence he has suffered much. The saddest blow was the death of his beloved wife who had been a true helpmeet to him toiling cheerfully by his side, and giving him encouragement until the dreadful climate did its work and she sank into the grave.

In describing his work to Dr. Johnston, the devoted Frenchman said: "I have been seven years here—a long time in one's short life; yet we are still passing through that arduous and uninteresting period of breaking the fallow ground and sowing the seed. We anxiously watch for the appearance of the little cloud and the showers of blessing which it shall bring . . . We know that the seed is not lost. Silently, secretly, under the clods it germinates, and the first shower shall adorn with verdure our parched ground. The time shall come; therefore we faint not."

NATIVE CONVERTS ON THE ZAMBESI, SOUTH AFRICA, BUILDING THEIR FIRST CHURCH.

The confidence thus beautifully expressed by the heroic missionary two years ago, has been justified by events. The photograph he sends home of the church in course of erection shows that the expected shower of blessing has come.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE POLICE.

A man who doesn't believe in God, ought not to be on the police force." This was the language of Mr. Lawrence Harrigan, of St. Louis, at the recent convention in Washington, D. C., of the Chiefs of Police of the United States and Canada. The occasion was the creation of a new office—that of chaplain—and the opening of the convention with prayer. Mr. D.C.Oliver, Chief of Police at Athens, Georgia, who was chosen for this position, said: "I esteem it great privilege to call upon my Maker for assistance in all the affairs of life. I am glad to go on record as one who believes in God as the ruler of police and all government. Strike out the idea of divine guidance and this police business will be wrecked upon a rock."

Flowers from Palestine.

An Exceptional Opportunity Presented to the Subscribers of "The Christian Herald."

OUR readers will be delighted to learn that we have a rich surprise in store for them — at least for those of them who quickly signify their wishes. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through Rev. H. B. Greene, has made in Palestine a varied and beautiful collection of flowers, whose value is enriched by Bible associations, and has pressed, preserved and bound them in album form. These albums are not only very handsome, but their value is beyond estimation. Rev. Dr. Talmage, who has seen them, writes:

You have all seen maps of Palestine, and heard sermons about Palestine, and sung hymns about Palestine, and longed for the opportunity of seeing Palestine, but this may be the first time you have ever held a part of Palestine in your hand. These are not pictures of flowers; any engraver or painter can give you them, but these were wrought, and spun, and colored by the hand of God. The ancestors of these flowers were touched by Moses, and Solomon, and Paul, and Christ. Through most of the year the Holy Land is all ablush with floral opulence. You find all the royal family of flowers there, some that you supposed indigenous to the far North, and others indigenous to the far South—the daisy, and hyacinth, crocus and anemone, tulip and water-lily, geranium and ranunculus, mignonette and sweet majoram. In the collection at Beyrout you may see eighteen hundred kinds of Holy Land flowers; while among trees are the oak of frozen climes, and the tamarisk of the tropics, walnut and willow, ivy and hawthorne, ash and elder, pine and sycamore.

Oh, the flowers! They are the angels of the grass. They all have voices. When the clouds speak, they thunder; when the whirlwinds speak, they shriek; when the cataracts speak, they roar; but when the flowers speak, they always whisper. Take this floral album to some quiet place and listen. Some of the flowers have different names now from those with which they were baptized in Bible times, but the change of name does not change their beauty, or aroma, or suggestiveness. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot do a lovelier thing than to put this Divine bouquet into the hands of its friends and patrons. The flower marks the exact line between the material world and the spiritual world. Heaven and earth meet at the white pillar of the calla-lily. T. DEWITT TALMAGE.

These Floral Albums will be ready for delivery about the middle of November. They will not be advertised among outsiders, and only those subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who act very promptly will have an opportunity of securing copies. The orders will be entered according to the postmarks, so that due allowwance may be made for those who send from a distance. There are hardly enough of these Floral Albums to supply more than one in fifty of our subscribers, and it is absolutely out of the question to have any more made up, as no flowers can be gathered in Palestine for this purpose before next spring. The Album is bound in rich olive silk cloth, gold edges, with gold side and back stamp and a very attractive emblematic design on the cover. Its contents are as follows:

Frontispiece—The Cedars of Lebanon.
Introduction by Rev. Dr. Talmage.
Certificate by U. S. Consul E. S. Wallace.
Commendatory by Hon. Selah Merrill.
The Flora of Palestine—by Rev. H. B. Greene.
Wild Flowers of Palestine—(Illustrated.)
Fifteen Depressed openings containing many beautiful specimens of real Palestine flowers.

These Albums of Palestine Wild-Flowers, with one year's extension of your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for $3.

As soon as enough orders have been received to exhaust the supply, the fact will be made known through the first paragraph of the "Brief Notes" in this paper.

A NEW MISSIONARY SCHOONER.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is building a new schooner for the use of the missionaries on the island of Ruk, in the Micronesian group, South Pacific Ocean, to take the place of the "R.W. Logan," lost two years ago.

The SUNDAY SCHOOL

THE TRIUMPH OF GIDEON.

S.S. Lesson for Oct. 13. Jud. 7: 13-23. Golden Text, Ps. 27: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

GOD'S military school is unique. He has a warfare peculiar to himself and to those who are fully surrendered to him, in which victory is absolutely sure. And yet such victory is not the work of a day; long, sometimes tedious preparation must precede it. Joshua, God's special commander-in-chief, passed his first examination when he found that his success on the plain, in fighting against the Amalekites, was not dependent on any personal gifts or prowess, but on the intercession of three men who dealt with God upon the mountain-top. (Exod. 17: 2.) His next examination was when he was called upon to surrender the whole command of the army of Israel into the hand of the to them invisible "Captain of the host of the Lord." (Josh. 5: 14, 15.) Twice he had failed, at Ai and in the matter of the Gibeonites, but otherwise he passed the initiatory school successfully. Now the Lord calls out Another General.

Israel had sinned, and God had brought upon them the evil of which he had spoken, and the uncircumcised and idolatrous Midianites were riding roughshod over the people of the Lord. At last the cry of his people went up to him and he began to prepare a deliverer. Without any warning the angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon while he was occupied in farming operations, and said unto him: "The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." Moses and Joshua had to be made little; to learn their nothingness. Gideon had to be aroused that he might take in that one whose family was "the least in Manasseh," and he the least in his father's house, could he chosen and used of God to deliver his people. This was the beginning of his military school: the great lesson was that whatever he might be, the Lord with him could do anything, everything.

This examination over, he must learn that all real faith is put to the test. He was the called of God to deliver Israel. But how should he deliver Israel if, in the very house where he lived, idols continued to exist? Idolatry must be overthrown at home. This was no easy matter, for Gidson was not the head and Master of the house, and he might have pleaded, I am not responsible. But his life had entered in a new phase, he must make all his calculations now on a new basis: the Lord was with him. What he could not do at home or abroad was perfectly easy to the Lord who was with him. Therefore he must pass another examination and be true at home.

His First Battle

must [illegible] against Baal in his father's house. Gideon was a timid man; he needed to be continually reassured. But God knew his heart was true, met him where he was and gave him the signs he asked for. (Jud. 6: 17: 24: 36-40). But a timid man must be as obedient as a courageous one and he must be true to God in his father's house. At God's command he abolished the idols, and the groves of Asherah in one night at the risk of his own life, and God stood by him, and turned the heart of his father, so that in one hour he became a witness against the worship he had till then patronized, saying of Baal: "If he be a god, let him plead for himself because one hath broken down his altar." And thus Gideon passed through another examination in his school. God gives his Holy Spirit to them that obey him (Acts 5: 32). The Spirit of the Lord came upon the man who had not failed in obedience at the risk of his life and now the least in his father's house was made a power because God was with him; "and Abiezer was gathered together after him." (Jud. 6: 34).

Now God had his instrument fully in hand, and he could go forward. Gideon had learned that with God all things are possible. He was now the head of an army of 32,000 men; but was, as much as ever, dependent upon God. What he had learned his troops must learn also. Therefore the Lord gave a command which was far from flattering to human nature and which might have seemed in man's eyes calculated to demoralize the army: "The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hand, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me. Now, therefore, go and proclaim in the ears of the people, saying, Whosoever is fearful and afraid [or trembling], let him return and depart from Mount Gilead." To human eyes, or in earthly warfare such a command might seem calculated to damp the enthusiasm and ardor of the troops, and to spread discouragement. But God never miscalculated. He tells us how all "the goodliness of the flesh" is fading as the flower of the field, and he would replace fleshly ardor for faith in the living God. God knew the people and Gideon was beginning to know God, and therefore he was not discouraged when more than two-thirds of his entire army left him, and returned, "fearful and in which the living God was to have the chief voice. But God must go farther still. Only ten thousand remained to meet a company of their enemies "like locusts for multitude," and "the Lord said unto Gideon: The people are yet too many, bring them down unto the water and I will try them for thee there." And Gideon, who had been in command of such a large army, had to see his men reduced to three hundred! But with this diminution of earthly resources, there came a word from the living God: "By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you and deliver the Midianites into thine hand: and let all the people go every man into his place."

What kind of reputation would Gideon have in Israel as a commander? What kind of respect would the Midianites have for a handful of three hundred men, all counted? No; not all counted. The Lord is a man of war, and in Gideon's eyes he counted far more than the 22,700 men who had been proved unfit for the Lord's battles. All the commissariat was disorganized; the disbanded troops returned, taking their provisions with them, and nothing was left for the three hundred who remained, but God and his faithfulness. It was the night before the battle, but Gideon was not occupied with self-made dreams of glory, nor self-made apprehensions of defeat; he was occupied with his God. "Arise get thee down into the camp," he said to his servant, "for I have delivered it into thine hand. But if thou fear—God can see fear when no outward sign betrays it—go thou with Purah thy servant down to the camp; and thou shalt hear what they say; and afterward shall thine hands be strengthened to go down into the camp." And Gideon went, and heard one man telling a dream to his fellows with the startling interpretation from a man of Midian: "This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash, a man of Israel: into his hand God hath delivered Midian, and all the host."

It was enough; Gideon saw no more the hosts of his enemies nor yet the miserable littleness of his own company. He saw only God, and there in the midst of that sleeping camp he worshipped, and returned to the camp of Israel with a new inspiration. He saw that the Lord's hour was come, and aroused his little company, saying: "Arise, for the Lord hath delivered into your hand the host of Midiam." And then he equipped his little forces. Dividing them into three companies, he provided every man with a trumpet, a torch and an empty pitcher, and gave the command: "Look on me and do likewise, and behold when I come to the outside of the camp, it shall be that as I do so shall ye do. When I blow the trumpet, I and all that are with me then blow ye the the trumpets also on every side of the camp, and say, The sword of the Lord and of Gideon."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

AT THE FOOT OF MT. GILBOA.

MORE than two hundred years appear to have passed since the death of Joshua, when Gideon appears on the scene. The Hebrews had not extended their occupation of the land. Indeed, in some instances they had been unable to maintain possession of the territories originally conquered under Joshua. In all, fifty-three years of the two centuries had been passed in subjection, their enemies having gained the upper hand. At this time they were again in trouble, and the historian is careful to point out the cause. They were not warriors: their only strength was in God, and they had offended him. Once more they had drifted into the worship of Baal, who, as his name implies, they regarded as the god of the soil of Canaan. Punishment must be meted out to them. In no other way can they be recalled to Jehovah. When they fall into trouble, they must seek him. Men are not very different now. Thousands of men in Christian lands never think of God in prosperity, never pray to him except they want something, or are in affliction. This time the punishment came from the Midianites, the wandering tribes descended from Abraham and Keturah, with whom Moses took refuge after killing the Egyptian overseer. The Midianites behaved much as the Koords do in Armenia at this day. When the Hebrews had sown their fields and were gathering in the harvest, the Midianites swarmed in like locusts, seizing the new grain. Seven years in succession they did this, and the harassed people were in despair. The story of their deliverance given in the book of Judges is evidently a combination of two separate accounts. One story describes the message of God, in answer to their prayer, as coming by a prophet to the whole people (Judges 6: 7-11); the effect it produced on Gideon in leading him to destroy the family idol; (6: 25-32); his summons to the tribes (6: 33-35); the weeding out of the army (7: 1-8), and the night surprise with the pitchers and the trumpets (7: 16-22). The other narrative, clearly distinct, though interwoven, describes the visit of the angel to Gideon (6: 12-24); the miracle of the fleece (6: 36-40); the dream overheard (7: 9-15), and the battle (7: 23, 25). In the one narrative the captive kings are called Oreb and Zeeb, and in the other Zebah and Zalmunna. The scene of the other conflict was the plain of Esdraelon at the foot of Mount Gilboa, in the Galilee region, where the Midianites had come to gather in the Hebrews' wheat. It is still the finest wheat district in Palestine. It is also the battle ground of the country. There Saul and Jonathan fell; there Josiah was slain; and there the Crusaders fought their fiercest battle. Gideon himself appears to have belonged to one of the chief families of Manasseh—a diffident, humble, but determined man. The most surprising thing about him is that after being the leader in so wonderful a movement, and experiencing the extraordinary dealing with God, he should in his old age have fallen into idolatry. A single verse at the close of the eighth chapter shows how little nations have changed since that early time. The people whom Gideon delivered forgot their obligations to him and showed no kindness to his family. Public benefactors of later times have had a like experience.

Came unto the outside of the camp. Every soldier knows how easily a panic may ensue from a night surprise. Gideon appears to have so distributed his three hundred men as to surround the entire camp. The fact of every man having a trumpet, or horn, would give the impression of a enormous army, as the common soldier did not carry a horn. Those were in the hand of the captains, and the Midianites would naturally assume in the darkness that each of the three hundred men was the captain of a company. The torches suddenly blazing out on all sides, when the pitchers that previously concealed them were broken would confirm the impression of a vast host. The Scottish emblem is associated with a similar plot. In one of the Danish invasions of Scotland the invaders arranged for a night attack. They were to crawl up under cover of the darkness to the camp where the Scotch army was sleeping and surprise it. The camp was perfectly silent and there was no apprehension of danger. The Danes had taken off their shoes, that no noise of their march should betray the approach. But as they neared the sleeping Scots, one of the Danes trod upon a thistle and involuntarily uttered a deep cry of pain. In the silence of the night it ran out like a trumpet note. Instantly the Scots were aroused. Every man sprang to his feet grasping his weapon and the Danes were repulsed. The thistle was from that time adopted as the national emblem.

A trumpet in every man's hand. People sometimes think that no one but ministers can preach; but it is a fact that the most effective preaching may be done by ordinary people who live in Christ. There is a trumpet in every man's hand if he will use it. An eminent preacher said that he found the best preaching in a certain town in which he spent the summer was being done by a child who was a confirmed invalid. One said to him, you should see her; would do you good. She is a model of patience. Another said, there must be some thing in that child's religion, otherwise she could not be so cheerful in her suffering. He went to see the child, and the mother told him before he went to her room that she was the light of the household. It was like heaven to be near her. She was so sweet and gentle and good that her being in the house was a blessing to them all. She had been lying there over a year ill of spinal disease, but in all that time she had never repined. The minister went into her room, and looking at the wan face on the pillow with its bright light in the eyes, could believe all he heard. The child had but one regret, she wished she was able to go about and work for Christ. "How happy you must be," she said, "in your work. It is strange that God keeps me here idle." "My child," said the minister, "when Christ apportions rewards, I would like to have one like yours. You are preaching a more eloquent serman by your life than I can ever hope to do."

Lamps within the pitchers. It was a strange equipment for an army, very inadequate one would say, yet it served its purpose. The gigantic enemy one hundred and thirty five thousand strong, according to the story, melted away before this little band of three hundred, with their lamps and pitchers and trumpets. It is a fit type of the great struggle for Christ's kingdom in this world. The trumpet proclamation of the Gospel by a comparatively small body of consecrated men. The lamps within the pitchers remind us of the wise king's declaration that "the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord" and of the Apostle's statement that "we have the treasure in earthen vessels." The fight will be won by the men whose souls God has lighted. Scientists tell us that if a diamond be exposed to the rays of the sun for some minutes and it be then taken into a dark room, it will give out a beautiful pale light. For some time it has the faculty of storing up and giving forth the light it has received. So the soul that lives in the light of God's countenance becomes a light giver to the world.

Armenia's Cry for Help.

e now used as dwellings by the Kurds, t several of them have been turned into ables for horses and cattle. One holy ace is now used as a ball-room for the arem of a Kurdish sheikh. In other stances, in which I have all the details, urches have been subjected to nameless filement.

The confiscation of these churches and onasteries means also the confiscation of e villages and lands tributary thereto, so at the poor villagers, who once gladly aid contributions to the churches, now ave to pay double the same contributions the Kurds. Any delay or neglect in the yment is met with beatings, outrages id deeds too shameful for public print.

Now, we have this condition at the pres- t moment in Armenia: The crop planted is year was entirely inadequate to the needs the population, and when the Kurds got rough pasturing their cattle in the grow- g fields they harvested the ripened grain r their own use, leaving only dry grass r the Armenians. The systematic perse- itions of the people, the exactions of the x-gatherers, and the repeated robberies by e Kurds have left the Armenians abso- tely penniless and foodless. Utterly un- le to maintain life in their nearly ruined id wasted villages, the country people are andering about from place to place, and owding into the cities. There is no work r them to be had, and no chance of earn- g enough to keep starvation at bay.

Assuming, merely for the sake of argu- ent and not as a probable contingency, at the long-delayed plan of reform is car- d out, and the Armenians are protected their lives and property, having no od, and no money with which to buy od, how are they to get through the long id bitter winter and keep breath in their naciated bodies until the coming of the ring enables them to raise a few early getables? How can people live until next me whose food now, in this month of ptember, consists of edible grass from e fields and roots from the mountain-side?

There is only one answer to this problem, id it is this: Unless these wretched peo- e—poor and mean and miserable beyond scription, but Christians and brethren vertheless—are succored by the Christian ement of the civilized nations, they will rish by thousands. Our duty, as a Chris- an nation, is to extend that help.

It is not difficult to foresee the condition Armenia, four months hence, should e now turn a deaf ear to the cries of the arving, which have haunted me night id day for weeks. If two hundred thousand ople begin a long winter with absolutely thing to eat and no chance of obtaining od, what will become of them? I do not ed to refer to letters of missionaries or to ports of Consuls, for having investigated the spot, I know what I have seen and ard.

It is for America to say whether these ople shall die or live. It is a possible ing that, after centuries of oppression and cades of persecution, they may not be fit live. That is at least open to argument. t from actual observation and personal ntact with them, I can testify that they e certainly not fit to die. There is still need of much missionary work among them, Christians though they be. In theory, they are the most intense and sincere Christians whom I have met. Whether they are that in practice or not, is not for me to judge. Honestly considering all the circumstances surrounding them, I should say that they are as good Christians as one really could expect them to be. During the Sassoun massacre, many of them had the choice of death or a denial of Christ, and they unhesitatingly chose death. "We cannot deny our Christ," they said, and the Turkish bayonets pierced them to the heart.

The Armenian will cling to his religion until the last breath has left his body. He is proud of the fact that his people were the first to accept Christianity as a nation. The Armenians were converted by Gregory, and they have remained to this day a Christian oasis in a wide-spreading wilderness of Mohammedanism, fire-worship, bigotry and idolatry. It is for the youngest Christian nation on earth to say whether the oldest shall perish and be no more, and whether the followers of Mohammed shall be the sole inhabitants of that land which, in the beginning of all things, was the Garden of Eden. If we turn a deaf ear now to the supplications of the starving thousands of fellow-Christians in Eastern Turkey, the coming of spring will see the troublous Armenian question forever at rest. There will be no more Armenian question, for there may be no more Armenians.

If, on the contrary, the practical Christians of our own land desire to assist in preserving this ancient Christian race in the land in which it took descent from the grandson of Noah, the way is clear. A little help extended now, will not only save the lives of those who are dropping dead of hunger from day to day, but will provide work during the coming winter.

The missionaries of Van have a most excellent plan for helping the poor, and when I left Armenia they were ready to put it into practical effect as soon as money should be received for beginning the work. The plan is to buy wool and give it out to the starving Armenian women to be spun, woven, and made up into various articles of clothing common to the country. The spinners, weavers, and knitters will be paid liberally for their work, and as each allotment of wool is made up, another will be given out. The manufactured articles will be sold and the proceeds be returned to the fund for the purchase of more wool and a continuance of the work of relief.

Since my return, I have received letters from Dr. Grace W. Kimball, Mrs. George C. Reynolds, and Mr. C. M. Hallward, the British Vice-Consul at Van, saying that this method of affording relief had been tried with about $350 received from England, and that it worked beyond their most sanguine expectations. The distinctive feature of this form of relief is that it gives work instead of charity to the starving, and retains their self-respect. Assuming such a method of relief were properly administered, I am satisfied, from observations in Armenia, that a contribution of one dollar would do three times as much good as though given outright in the ordinary way of charity.

In this necessarily brief article, I have dwelt entirely upon the starvation in Armenia, because it is the most urgent feature of the situation. I have not touched upon the Sassoun massacre, because as the Grand Vizier of Turkey truthfully says, "that is an old story." The victims of Sassoun were in many respects more fortunate than their fellows, for they had at least the privilege of dying quickly. They escaped persecution, torture, and starvation. There are very many hopeless creatures in Armenia to-day who would welcome a second Sassoun as an easy release from the burden and shame of living.

As to the cause of the persecution which has brought 200,000 human beings to the actual brink of starvation, there can be but one explanation. The Armenians are Christians. Should they become Mohammedans their troubles would vanish, and return no more. It is for the sake of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, that they are persecuted unto death.

WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD.

ARMENIAN GIRLS SPINNING.

Photographed by our Commissioner.

Mr. Howard sailed on the steamship "Campania" for Liverpool on Saturday last, whence he will go to Armenia, via London, Paris, Vienna, Constantinople and Trebizonde. From the latter place he will ride to Erzeroum and Van across a country that abounds in perils for the ordinary traveler. Mr. Howard, however, is not an inexperienced traveler. Though still comparatively young, he has visited fifteen different countries, and his journey through Armenia has given him a valuable acquaintance with the traveling facilities there. Furthermore, he is entirely aware of the risks attendant upon such a journey, but bravely accepts them all, trusting to a protecting Providence to guard him and conduct him safely through every danger.

AN ARMENIAN HOUSEWIFE BAKING CAKES.

(Photographed by Mr. Howard—The cakes are of remarkable size.)

Of our Commissioner's journeyings, his doings when he reaches the centres of Armenian suffering and the progress of the relief work, we expect to keep our readers fully informed. As this humane undertaking is their work and ours jointly, we ask of all the most active and earnest co-operation. We ask an interest in their prayers that the work may be richly blessed to all concerned and be made the means of rescuing many of those poor, suffering fellow-creatures from still greater misery and of changing the land to which all history and tradition point as the site of Eden, from being a land of desolation and death to one whose people live to bless those followers of their Master who have come, as very angels, to their relief, in such a time of sore trial.

The following contributions to the Armenian Relief Fund have already been received:

ANCIENT ASSYRIAN TABLETS.

Many of the recent discoveries of tablets in Ancient Assyria, on being deciphered, are found to relate to events referred to in the Bible, and are actually corroborative of them. One of the most remarkable instances of this character is a tablet relating to the death of the great Assyrian monarch, Sennacherib. It is of unbaked clay, measuring six and a-half by seven and three-quarter inches, and is inscribed with a short but very important inscription relating to a series of events which are of the greatest value to Biblical as well as to historical scholars. It is thought probable that, if we could only obtain the remaining portions of this tablet, we should have a complete record from the earliest times down to the fall of the Babylonian Empire.

The inscription begins with the reign of Nebonasar, and ends with the accession of Shamas-sum-ukin, B. C. 650, who was a foster-brother of the renowned Assurbani-pal, the Sardanapalus of the Greek writers. It appears that a very violent disturbance broke out in Borsippa during the reign of Nebonasar, and that it was spreading so rapidly that it was only with difficulty put down. Nadimi, who was the leader of the rebellion, died, which fact put an end to the revolt. The seventh paragraph on the tablet deals with the death of Tiglath Pileser, and the accession to the throne of the great Assyrian monarch Shalmanezer.

The most important portion of the tablet is that which deals with the wars and death, or rather assassination, of Sennacherib. Elam revolted, and Sennacherib went out at the head of a large army to put down the disturbance. Hallusu, who was the chief rebel, marched on Babylon, and placed one certain Nergaluzesib upon the throne. This man was killed at a place near Niffer, and Sennaecherib, on his return home was killed by the hand of one of his sons. For some time past doubt in certain quarters where the "Higher Criticism" theory prevails had been thrown on the accuracy of the Biblical account as recorded in 2. Kings 19:37, where we read: "And it came to pass, as Sennacherib was worshipping in the house of Nisroch, his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword; and they escaped into the land of Armenia. And Esarhaddon his son reigned in his stead."

The truth, however, of the Biblical statement is thoroughly borne out by the new tablet, for in this we have the following information: "On the 20th day of Tobit (modern December-January), Sennacherib, King of Assyria, in a revolt his sons killed him. On the 18th day of Adar (February-March), Esarhaddon, his son, sat on the throne of Assyria." How closely these two items in the chronicle agree with the Biblical narrative will be readily seen.

HELP! HELP!

GOD help the young man! I get letters every week from somebody in the country, saying: "My son has gone to the city; he is in such a bank, or store, or shop. Will you look after him. He was a good boy at home, but there are many temptations in the city. Pray for him and counsel him." I want to help the old. They begin to feel in the way; they begin to feel neglected, perhaps. I want at the edge of the snow-bank of old age, to show them the crocus. I want to put in their hands the staff and the rod of the Gospel. God bless your gray hairs. I want to help these wives and mothers in the struggle of housekeeping, and in the training of their children for God and for heaven. I want to preach the Gospel as appropriate to Martha as to Mary. God help the martyrs of the kitchen, and the martyrs of the drawing-room, and the martyrs of the nursery, and the martyrs of the sewing-machine. I want to help merchants; whether the times are good or bad, they have a struggle. I want to preach a sermon that will last them all the week; when they have notes to pay and no money to pay them with; when they are abused and assaulted. I want to give them a Gospel as appropriate for Wall street, and Broadway, and Chestnut street, and State street, as for the communion table. I want to help dissipated men who are trying to reform. Instead of coming to them with a patronizing air that seems to say, "How high I am up, and how low you are down," I want to come to them with a manner which seems to say, "If I had been in the same kind of temptation I should have done worse." I have more interest in the lost sheep that bleats on the mountain than in the ninety-nine asleep in the fold.

A WARNING WORD.

FROM the utter collapse of many of the brain-workers of this country I may say, "Brethren of literary toil, you had better hold up!" If you are going at the rate of sixty miles an hour, you had better stop and go no more than thirty. The temptations to overwork for literary men are multiplying all the time in increased newspapers and magazines, and lecturing platforms. The temptation to night-work is especially great—that kind of work which is most exhausting and ruinous. When the sun goes down, God puts his candle out, and says to the world, "My child, you had better go to sleep; I have put the candle out." The brass-headed nails of coffins are made out of gas-light! The money that a man makes by midnight [illegible] funeral. When the devil cannot stop a good man's work by making him lazy, then he comes into the editor's room, or into the minister's study, or into the artist's studio, and he says, "Go it! you ought to be doing five times the work you are doing. You ought to write two books this year. You ought to send out twenty or thirty additional articles. You ought to deliver fifty more lectures." Then, when his health fails, there is satanic congratulation. The devil first tries to stop a useful man by making him lazy. Failing in that, he then puts on the lash and digs in the spurs, and drives him to death. I say, therefore, to the men who are toiling with their brain, you had better "slow up," as they say on the railroad lines. God gives to every man a certain amount of work, and he does not want him to do any more than that. "Do thyself no harm," is advice no more appropriate to the jailer when the prison is tumbling around his ears, than it is appropriate to those the wards of whose health and the fastnesses of whose strength begin to tremble with the earthquake. Paul was very careful of his body; long before the days of expressage he sends hundreds of miles for his great coat to Troas. Oh, ye men of literary toil! you have been careful about keeping the candle snuffed and burning brightly; is it not almost time you began to look after the candlestick? The sharp sword will not make any execution unless you have a handle to it. Through all the editorial rooms, and all the studies of this country, let the warning reverberate; let it come up from the graves of recent martyrs to science, and literature, and religion.

SAVED A FARM.

YOU cannot afford to smoke: you cannot afford to chew. You either take very good tobacco, or you take very cheap tobacco. If it is cheap I will tell you why it is cheap. It is made of burdock and lampblack and sawdust and colt's foot and plantain leaves and fuller's earth and salt and alum and lime and a little tobacco, and you cannot afford to put such a mess as that in your mouth. But if you use expensive tobacco, do you not think it would be better for you to take the amount of money which you are now expending for this herb, and which you will expend during the course of your life, if you keep the habit up, and with it buy a splendid farm, and make the afternoon and the evening of your life comfortable?

There are young men whose life is going out inch by inch from cigarettes. Now, do you not think it would be well to listen to the testimony of a merchant of New York, who said this: "In early life I smoked six cigars a day at six and a-half cents each. They averaged that. I thought to myself one day, I'll just put aside all I would consume in cigars and all I would consume if I keep on in the habit, and I'll see what it will come to by compound interest." And he gives this tremendous statistic: "Last July completed thirty-nine years since, by the grace of God, I was emancipated from the filthy habit, and the saving amounted to the enormous sum of $29,102.03 by compound interest. We lived in the city, but the children, who had learned something of the enjoyment of country life from their annual visits to their grandparents, longed for a home among the green fields. I found a very pleasant place in the country for sale. The cigar money came into requisition, and I found it amounted to a sufficient sum to purchase the place, and it is mine." Now, boys, you take your choice. Smoking without a home, or a home without smoking, This is common sense as well as religion.

REVIVAL OF PISTOLS.

THERE has been some deadly shooting of late. We wonder that there is not more havoc with human life in this day, when it is getting so popular to [illegible] arms. Most of our young men and many of our boys, do not feel themselves in time unless they have a pistol accompaniment. Men are locked up or fined [illegible] their persons, but revolvers go free. There is not half so much danger from knife as pistol. The former may let the victim escape minus a good, large slice, but the latter is apt to drop him dead. On the frontiers, or engaged in police duty, fire-arms may be necessary; but in the ordinary walk of life pistols are, to say the least, a superfluity. Better empty your pockets of these dangerous weapons, and see that your sons do not carry them. In all the ordinary walks of life an honest countenance and orderly behavior are sufficient defence. You had better stop going into society where you must always be ready to shoot somebody.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A. L., Pittston, Pa. Where can I get a book or magazine that will tell me how to take care of all kinds of trees, and how to drive worms and other troublesome insects from the same, and how to have success with a garden?

For trees, write to Green's Nursery, Rochester, N. Y. For garden, write to W. Atlee Burpee & Co., Phila., Pa.

Mrs. J. W. L——, Pittsburg, Pa. The ladies of our Church Society would like to do something for the Armenian Christians, whose distressed condition has been presented in your paper. If we should send any contribution, can you have it forwarded for us? Can a few dollars accomplish any good?

Yes: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has sent its representative, Mr. W. W. Howard, to Armenia where he will organize a missionary committee to distribute any relief our friends may desire to send through this journal. It is estimated that $5 will suffice to support an Armenian mother and two children for a year.

We give space to this nice letter from Mrs. W., Bristol, Conn., concerning the kind deeds of some young friends of our Children's Home:

Enclosed find $9 54 for the little waifs at Mont Lawn. This money was raised by three dear little ten-year-old girls of Goodwin street, Bristol, Conn., who had become interested by hearing about the distress of these poor unfortunates and their great joy in being able to roam over the fields. Now it is very hard for happy, healthy children to understand such destitution, for all have loving parents, comfortable homes and plenty of fresh air. On Saturday (their holiday), they started out on their errand of mercy and by nightfall had collected the amount stated. Being shy and unused to such work, we think they deserve a word of commendation. They are May Roberts, $3.83; Grace Colvin, $2.48; Bessie Gwillim, $3.23.

Constant Reader, Springfield, O. Is it possible to ascertain how many persons crossed the Jordan at the Exodus?

Not accurately, but you can form an estimate. There were 603,550 men about twenty years of age who were able to bear arms. (See Numbers 1: 46.) Besides there were the Levites who were not counted. Thus if you add to the number given, the women, the old men and all the children up to twenty years of age, it is fair to suppose there must have been from two to two and a half millions altogether. There may have been more if the slaughter of the male children in Egypt as ordered by Pharaoh was at all generally carried out. (See Exodus 1: 22.)

L. T. Penderton, River Junction. Do such passages as John 13: 4, 5, 14, 15 explicitly require Christians to practice the washing of each other's feet as a rite?

No; Christ was simply enjoining humility. Up to the very last day of his life, the disciples contended with each other as to who should be the greatest in his kingdom. He told them that he who would be the greatest must humble himself. He gave them an object lesson in washing their feet. In that land and time, sandals were worn which had no covering for the top of the foot. Guests, after a hot, dusty walk, were waited upon by a servant who washed their feet before they sat down to a meal. In taking the servant's place on this occasion, Christ showed them that there was a glory in service; that distinction and honor in his kingdom were not for those who contended for them, but for those who thought so little of themselves and their own dignity that they would sacrifice both to make others happy. It is a silly literalism, showing incapacity to understand Christ's spirit, to perform the same act by way of obedience to a precept which was meant to be applied in many ways. The man who would give up his seat in a car to some poor, tired woman; the cultured lady who would take a nurse's place at the bedside of some penniless sufferer, obeys Christ more intelligently than by washing the feet of the brethren.

Old Subscriber, Galveston, Tex. God says in his Word: "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." This troubles me greatly. Please give me some encouragement if there is any. Does it follow that a man has to pay the full penalty and reap just what he has sown? Although the greater part of the sins committed was done ignorantly years before conversion, I would willingly give my right hand to atone for the same.

That was the law; but when Christ died for the sins of the world the law was fulfilled, and now those who are in Christ are no more under the law, but are reconciled to God and their sins are covered. (See Romans 8: 1-12). He paid the penalty and it is only needed that we receive him sincerely in our hearts and follow him in our lives, to be accepted of God. There are, however, certain natural and inevitable consequences of sin that follow the offender through life and from which he need not expect to escape. If he ruins his body through dissipation, if he neglects the training of his children, if he wastes his inheritance in wicked courses, he need not expect that his repentance will restore his shattered health, reclaim his erring family, or bring back what he has squandered. He has sown corruption and in this life at least must reap as he has sown. On the other hand, by accepting God's free gift of salvation he may escape the "greater punishment."

"Sabbath," Philadelphia. I, being a member of church, think it wrong to play instrumental music on the Sabbath, unless sacred music, contending that we have six days to play marches, secular tunes, and others. Am I too harsh in my condemnation?

No; you are right. The playing of secular music is to be ranked with the indulgence of any other secular pastimes, and would be a desecration of the Lord's day.

Carrie McCord, Orion, Ill. What language was used previous to the building of the Tower of Babel?

Unity of language is assumed by the sacred historian, as prevailing before the confusion of tongues, but philological research fails to identify that language by any name now known to men. In all probability it was language of an elementary order, and reducible to such words and phrases as were needed to express the natural wants and the ordinary surroundings and avocations of men—a speech that had been gradually growing in volume and variety as it was handed down from father to son and as age and experience added to it. The divergence of the people into distinct tribes and nations, after the "confusion," naturally gave birth to a variety of dialects and languages, traces of some of which still remain; but of the universal post-diluvian tongue employed when "the whole earth was of one speech" (Gen. 11: 1), there is not now even a trace.

W. A. C., Liberty Corner, N. Y. Years ago two young men came before a notable church meeting of those days, with what was a novel project of sending out missionaries to the heathen of foreign lands. This church meeting or assembly was probably the most conspicuous, influential and representative of any of that period. My impressions incline me to think it was held in Scotland and about 200 years ago. The meeting, entirely representative of the sentiment then existing in the church generally, emphatically "sat down" upon the two young men and their project of sending missionaries to the heathen of foreign lands as being altogether fanatical and "wild goose chase." What church gathering was that when and where did it convene, etc.

There is no authentic record of such a scene, although Rev. Samuel Pearson refers to it in his writings but without giving either date or location. One of the older pastors then said to have replied to the younger enthusiast: "Young man, when God wants to convert the heathen, he will do it without your aid and without mine." A somewhat similar story is told of Carey's experience and also of Count Zinzendorf and his missionary companions.

Constant Reader, Ashland, O. 1. If our country will sustain more than a billion people why so many willing workers out of work? 2. Should ministers keep back part of the Gospel message in order to please some rich brethren in the church? 3. Should not all Christian people, including ministers, do all in their power to oppose the rich, trying to enslave the poor; also the saloon and other evils?

1. The depressed condition of our industries is the cause, but the prospect of better times is daily growing brighter. 2. Certainly not. There can be no spiritual growth in a church where the full Gospel is not preached to rich and poor alike. 3. The first part of your question is a problem of political economy concerning which there is a wide variety of opinion. While it is wrong for the rich to oppress the poor, there are many who will not agree with you that there is any organized plan to do what you intimate. There are many rich men who make their wealth a real blessing to all around them. We agree with you that Christians should unite in repressing the baneful saloon power and kindred evils.

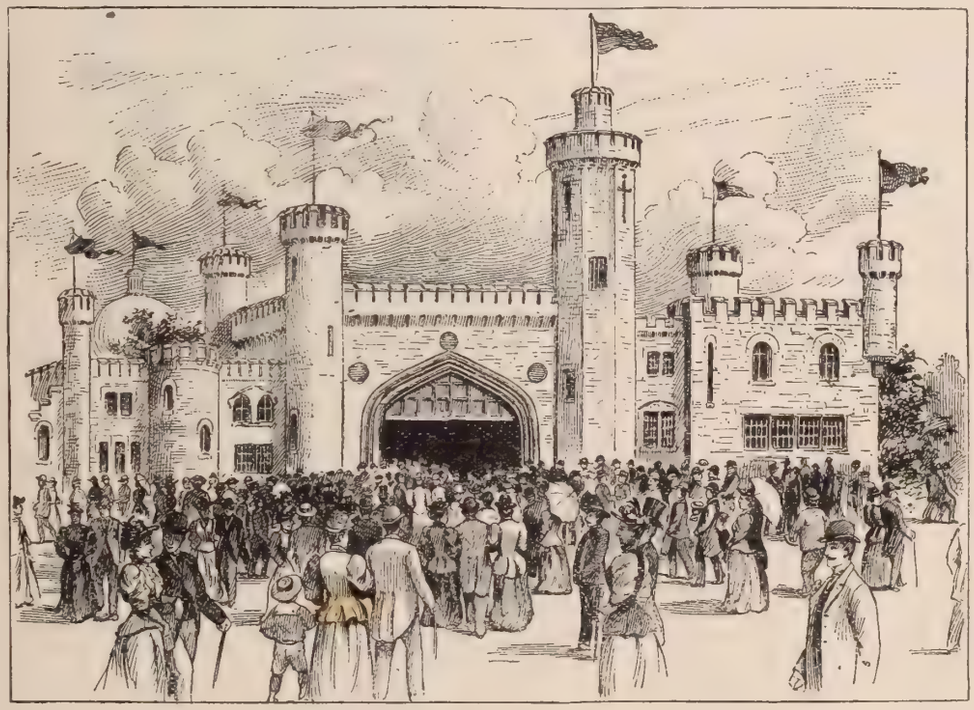
ATLANTA'S EXPOSITION.

SKILLED intelligence, deft hands and enthusiastic hearts working together through many months have brought to successful culmination the great achievement of which the whole South is reasonably proud. Upwards of five hundred buildings, covering an area of two hundred acres, have been reared at Atlanta, Ga., and exhibits of rare interest from all parts of our own land and from foreign lands have been gathered there. It is a marvel to see how the work has been done. Commenced in a period of unusual financial depression, when the whole country was weary of the very name of World's Fairs, the southern people persevered, contributed money, secured Government co-operation and have produced a result that fills the beholder with admiration. Avoiding the cheap and meretricious materials which pretend to be what they are not, Georgia has used her own pine woods for the buildings and found them capable of all the architectural requirements of the exposition. The exhibits are thoroughly representative. Many of the Southern States have their own buildings and the others are fully represented in the main buildings. The agricultural exhibits show a diversity and possibility positively amazing. But it is in the mineral and forestry departments that the great interest is centred. There the capitalist will see indications of the vast field, as yet scarcely touched, from which boundless wealth may be obtained. Nor have the departments of manufacturing, the arts and sciences, transportation and electricity been neglected. In all these the display, although smaller than at Chicago, is less bewildering and more intelligently arranged. The whole exposition is a model of taste. With volley of cannon, the blare of trumpets, the shrieking of steam whistles, and thunders of cheers, the great exposition was inaugurated on Sept. 18. At Buzzard's Bay, Mass., a thousand miles away, President Cleveland and his family sat listening into the telegraph instrument clicking off the record of the inaugural ceremonies. The eloquent speeches of Georgia's famous orators and distinguished guests ended soon after six o'clock, and then Mr. Cleveland sent a brief message of congratulation over the wire and pressed an electric button with his thumb. The pressure sent a thrill of electric power through the mighty machinery collected in the great halls, and the gigantic wheels turned in obedience to the mysterious force. The vast crowds gathered to witness the opening cheered with might and main as the long expected ceremony was thus triumphantly completed. The country joins in the jubilation, and with hearty good will wishes success to the enterprise and to the South in its career of fraternal emulation. The best feature of all such undertakings is the sense of brotherhood they are capable of inspiring, and this has been very marked in the Atlanta Exposition. They remind us of the day that will surely come when in such brotherly intercourse the nations of the world will come together, their jealousies and hatreds and prejudices all forgotten, and as the prophet said:

They shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Micah 4: 3.)



THE MAIN ENTRANCE TO THE EXPOSITION AT ATLANTA, GA.

Lying in a Tomb.

A retired merchant in Brooklyn is causing some anxiety to his friends. They fear that his grief over the loss of his wife is undermining his reason. Her body lies in a vault that has been built specially for it in Evergreens Cemetery, and there her husband spends most of his time. He has furnished the place with memorials of his beloved wife. Photographs of her at different ages hang on the walls; the chair she formerly used is placed in a recess beside her dressing-table. Her ornaments and various articles of her clothing have been collected and placed there. On a table is a piece of unfinished knitting, with the needles in it, just as she left it before her last illness. Her feminine treasures and mementos of places she and her husband visited together are stored in a cabinet in a vault. There, beside the casket which stands on a raised platform in the centre, the husband spends his days, surrounded with the articles associated with his beloved wife. He goes to the vault as soon as the cemetery gates are open in the morning, and remains until they are closed at night. He feels that there and there only, is he near his wife. It is the mistake that, in one form or another, distorts so many lives. Most people realize that it is a mistake, when they see the body dead and decomposing, but while it lives they treat it as if it were the most important part of the human being, whose interests must be considered, even at the cost of the interests of the soul. Many, like this man in his wife's tomb, have failed to learn the lesson suggested by the question the angels addressed to the women at the sepulchre:

Why seek ye the living among the dead? (Luke 24: 5.)

A Kindly Eviction.

Several families in New York cherish a grievance against the Department of Buildings which will not enlist public sympathy. The aggrieved families lived in a five-story tenement-house in Park Row. A few days ago, the police received notice that the joint wall between that house and the next one was bulging ominously. The next house had a saloon on the ground floor and the saloon-keeper's family occupied the floors above. That is an old house but the five-story house next door is comparatively new. The police sent for a building inspector who promptly condemned both houses. He said the party wall was not strong enough originally to support the five-story house as well as the old house and it had since been weakened by the drippings from the ice-box, barrels and waste pipes, which the saloon-keeper had kept near it. The Building Department securely shored up the houses until the owner should tear them down and rebuild them. The tenants were ordered to leave, but disregarded the order. As they would not quit voluntarily, the police ejected them by force, much to their disgust. They roundly abused the officers and protested vigorously against being expelled. Sometimes Christian workers incur enmity and abuse in the same way. Those whom they would seek to save from eternal disaster do not realize their danger and resent being disturbed.

A scorner loveth not one that reproveth him. (Prov. 15: 12.)

To Disinfect the Telephone.

An article in a medical journal sounds one of those notes of warning which often distress nervous persons. It states that a case of diphtheria was recently traced to the use of a public telephone. A man in a weak state of health and consequently susceptible to any infectious disease, used a public telephone shortly after it had been used by another man, who was suffering from diphtheria. He was soon afterward stricken with the disease and came near losing his life. The physician who attended him had no doubt that the germs of the disease had been deposited in the mouthpiece of the telephone by the moist breath of the previous user and were inhaled by the next user. He thinks that the germs of consumption and other diseases that are produced by bacteria, may be transmitted in the same way. He suggests that a device, which he says is in use in Germany, be adopted in this country as a protection. It consists of a pad of disks of paper with a hole in the middle, which shall be inserted in the mouthpiece of the telephone, the user before speaking into the mouthpiece to tear off the top disk, which would be the one impregnated with the breath of the previous user. If disease can really be communicated by the telephone this seems a simple means of preventing it. It is much to be wished that some means as effective could be devised to prevent the propagation of moral disease, the germs of which are often communicated by the words of some morally corrupt person.

Moving his lips he bringeth evil to pass. (Prov. 16: 30.)

Relatives of an Orphan.

The law courts of Denver, Colo., appear likely to have a difficult case submitted to them. A prosperous business man died suddenly a short time ago in that city, leaving no will. Ordinarily, the property would go to the next of kin; but this man did not know his relatives. The story used to be told of his being picked up at sea on a piece of wreckage when he was an infant. The real fact, however, is now stated to be that both his parents died on board ship, leaving him friendless when he was but a few weeks old. The captain of the ship, a kind-hearted man, took care of him until inquiries should be made for him, or for his parents. None were ever made and the captain kept him, educated him and gave him a start in business. The lad proved intelligent and energetic. He succeeded in business and made a small fortune; but although he had plenty of friends, he never met with any claiming relationship to him. Since his death, however, several have appeared. Among them are persons respectively claiming to be an uncle, a brother and a sister. They never made themselves known to him during his lifetime. The claimants will have to furnish proof of their relationship before their claim on the dead man's property is admitted. People who avow kinship only when there is something to be gained by it and hold aloof when there are duties to be performed, must expect that the genuineness of their claim will be suspected. Yet there are many who treat Christ in that way. They do not confess him before men nor take up their cross to follow him; but they hope to go to heaven and, like Balaam, they say:

Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his. (Numbers 23: 10.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. C. P. Nash, who Formerly Labored among the Indians of the Northwest under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society, has been appointed Organizing Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance.

Rev. George C. Needham's services in Belfast, Ireland, have been the means of winning many young men for Christ. They were held in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association of that city.

A Letter from Foochow, China, from Rev. P. W. Pitcher to the "Christian Intelligencer," says that the wounded ladies who escaped massacre at Hwasang are recovering. Their wounds were severe but Dr. Gregory's prompt and skilful treatment saved their lives. They will be disfigured for life.

The Sad News Comes from Paris that M. Arthur D. Rougemont who made a heroic effort to establish the Protestant daily journal "Le Signal," and has conducted it successfully hitherto, is dead. He was an enthusiastic supporter of the Mc-All Missions and of Miss De Broen's work in Belleville.

Gradually the Lands in which the Gospel has never been preached are becoming few. One of them has disappeared from the list this year. It is Chinese Turkestan, a little-known territory lying between China and Russian territory in Asia. The Swedish Missionary Association has now established a station there. Two missionaries, one of whom is a Swede and the other an Armenian, have gone out and will live at Kashgar, where there is a large population and the people are well disposed toward foreigners.

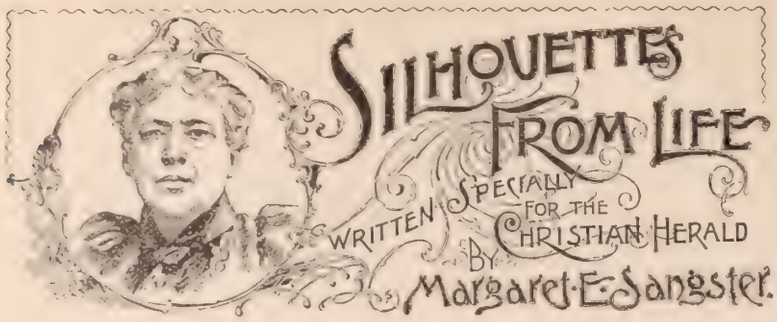
King Khama, the Christian ruler of a tribe in Bechuanaland, is visiting England. Among his attendants is a man who was rescued from savagery and heathenism by Dr. Livingstone. Khama says that it is impossible for a European to conceive of the intense reverence felt in Africa for the memory of the great missionary-explorer. Khama's chief business is to secure English co-operation with him in his efforts to keep rum out of his country.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has Closed his Meetings at Stroudsburg, Pa., with a wonderful celebration. Six churches united in the movement, and the large rink in which the services were held was crowded night after night. Large numbers made confession of Christ and all the churches are receiving accessions to their membership.

The Tenth Annual Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies of New York State, will be held in Brooklyn Oct. 8 and 9. The business meetings will be held in the Academy of Music, and on Tuesday evenings simultaneous public meetings will be held there and in Plymouth Church, and on Wednesday evening in the Clermont Ave. Rink and Simpson M. E. Church. All inquiries should be addressed to Mr. Harry S. Shaw, 140 Nassau avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Rev. A. C. Gaebelein, Whose Work Among the Jews of New York is well known, writes us from St. Petersburg that he has received a cordial welcome in Russia. No obstacles have been placed in the way of his preaching, and he has had large audiences in Lodi, Warsaw, Wilna, and St. Petersburg. Our readers will be glad to learn that Mr. Gaebelein is preparing illustrated articles on religious life in Russia for this journal, giving sketches of Jews, Stundists, and Greek Christians.

Evangelist Hugh W. Brown of Chicago, has been holding meetings among the laborers constructing the Drainage Canal near Chicago. A harder, more unpromising field could not be imagined. The religious indifference and hostility were appalling. Mr. Brown, however, persevered and before the close of the work was holding fourteen meetings at various points on the canal every Sunday and on several week evenings. There were fifteen thousand men working between Chicago and Juliette, so that there was an abundant field for labor. All nationalities were represented. The work began June 1 and continued to the middle of August. There were many encouraging incidents and good reason for believing that a large number of souls were rescued from the bondage of Satan. Mr. Brown is now resting at his home at Morgan Park, Ill., before commencing his Fall campaign.



Milly's Hard Fight.

YOU never would have thought, to look at the sweet face of Milly McLeod, that she had ever known what it was to have a hard fight—with Apollyon. That vanity and self-will and ill-temper had been foes which had taxed her powers, and come near making her miserable for life, was a fact known only to God and Milly. Yes, and to one other, Milly's dear stepmother.

Her own mother died when she was born. Her father, unable to bear the desolation of his home, went away to travel in far lands, leaving the little one to grow up in the fostering care of a grandmother who idolized, and a nurse who was devoted to her. Through Mildred's early childhood she ruled everyone around her with the absolute despotism of a princess to whom nothing could be denied. Endowed with singular beauty and much charm of manner, she queened it over her governess and her various masters in the same sweet, but imperious way, and when at last, in her sixteenth year, Doctor McLeod married again, bringing home with pride and rejoicing, an elegant woman as his bride, a woman but ten years his daughter's senior, it was fated that there should be strife and heart-burning under the old roof. Milly's sway was no longer supreme; she was relegated to the second place, and she did not like it, nor submit without a struggle. Many a night her pillow was wet with her tears — hot rebellious tears such as the young shed.

The stepmother was a highly-cultivated and brilliant gentlewoman who had been a teacher, and therefore, in her sphere, an autocrat. She soon perceived the defects in Milly's education, and set herself to her daughter's improvement.

"Milly," she said one morning when the two were driving along a road fringed with golden-rod and asters, while the sumac lifted its vivid plumes nearby, and away off the edge of the meadow blushed pink with the splendid marsh-mallow's bloom, "Milly, do you know what you need beyond everything else, dear?"

"To be let alone," answered Milly promptly, "not to be nagged at and interfered with all the time. I'm willing to let you take your way, why can I not take mine. I was happy enough till you came here, Mrs. McLeod."

"I am sorry I prove such a disturbing element, Mildred; I did not mean to, and I suppose I may be mistaken in trying to form you as I would like to see your father's daughter. But dear, you are very young, and you do not see how much more pleasing and lovable you would be if you could learn to submit your will to others, to govern your moods."

"It's pleasant," said Milly sarcastically, and not without a show of reason, "to be taking a nice drive on a day like this, and to be lectured all the way."

Mrs. McLeod sighed, she meant so well. But she was blind to her own lack of tact, and her discouragement depressed her. In the schools where she had taught, girls like Milly had loved her dearly, but then she had not stood toward them in the relation of a stepmother.

They drove on in silence. Milly reflected bitterly that she had been called young—no girl of sixteen likes to be taxed with youth, and conceited, and ungoverned, and the worst of it was, a little undertone of [illegible] her stepmother's plain-speaking. It was true.

"I am a horrid thing!" said Milly's heart to herself, a frown descending on the fair brow, the rosy lips setting themselves in a firm line. "But I'll never give in to this interloper, never! I'll die first!"

And, then, all of a sudden, like lightning from a clear sky, it seemed as if Milly were to be taken at her word, and might die first. For whether it was that old Billy, the gentle horse which had never balked before in all his quiet life, was scared by a rabbit darting over the path, or whether a wasp stung him, or whether he felt that the hill before him was too steep and the load behind him too heavy, no one could ever tell. Old Billy balked going up-hill, and then balked down-hill. Mrs. McLeod's whole strength was as a feather against that fierce rush and backward whirl of the great brute, and over a sheer rocky wall, five feet high, down a slope into a green field thick with the wild carrot flower and waving grass of September, went phaeton, women, and horse, all in a struggling, broken, confused heap.

Billy fell over, providentially, on the side away from the ladies, and his legs were encoiled in the harness and imprisoned in the shafts; Mrs. McLeod crawled out of the wrecked phaeton, and dragged out Mildred. The white face, the limp hands, the damp dews around lips and forehead told their story. Milly was in a dead faint.

The best thing to do was the only thing that could be done, viz., to lay the girl down flat, her head a trifle lower than her body. She "came to" presently, and the first words that penetrated her be-clouded consciousness were these:

"Oh! Father above, save her precious life: forgive me for my jealousy and harshness; make me loving and tender. Spare her to her father on earth, for Jesus' sake." Tears rained on Milly's pallid face.

The blue eyes opened. "Don't cry so, mother," said Milly, according the sacred name for the first time. "I'm better, and I'll be good."

Mrs. McLeod left Milly lying on the soft ground, with the elastic moss and heather making a couch for her body, and the cushion from the carriage supporting her head, while she went for assistance across the meadows to a farm-house not far off. The horse was rescued from his fortunate imprisonment and made comfortable in a loose stall at the farmer's, and a conveyance was brought to take Milly and her mother home.

It was after that day that Milly had her hard fight. For she had sustained in her fall an injury to the spine, and for eighteen months was limited to a sofa life. Then Satan came and tempted her, and she was often overcome, and often cross and trying and difficult beyond belief. Her stepmother developed patience and gentleness of which she had never known herself capable, and into the house and into the invalid's chamber came day by day a radiant Presence, the form of one like unto the Son of Man.

When at last strength returned to Milly, and pain vanished, and she could walk and run and do everything that others do, a wonderful added sweetness came to her face, the grace of the power of an inward life. Beautiful Milly McLeod carried all before her. Children clung to her gown, men and women vied for her favor. A stately and courtly gentleman wooed and won her as his wife.

She had fought a good fight, and conquered peace.

All desiring to be enrolled on the list of patrons, should send their names and addresses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MEDICAL MISSIONS IN JAPAN.

SINCE the beginning of the present year, and particularly in consequence of the late war with China, medical missionary work has experienced a marked impetus in Japan. Never before was the medical missionary so warmly welcomed in the Mikado's realm as now. He finds all doors open to him, and the possibilities of doing effective Christian work in Japanese homes are many times multiplied. Writing on this subject in "Life and Light," Dr. John C. Berry, of Kyoto, Japan, says:

"In days of strong anti-christian feeling in Japan I have seen Christian cungregations grow up out of the Christian dispensaries, the medical assistants becoming officers in the church organizations; while in the hospital wards I have seen men and women of determined opposition to the truth so touched by the kindness experienced and influenced by God's holy Word, as to accept Christ as their Saviour and Lord, and go back as teachers and preachers to their people. Unlike the clerical missionary, who carries his message to the people, the medical missionary has the people come to him; and thus every year, from a well-conducted mission hospital and dispensary, thousands go back to villages and towns far distant from the centres, carrying with them a knowledge of God's Word and of the practical application of Christian charity to the suffering and unfortunate. They have seen Christianity as a life, and are thus prepared to adopt it as a creed.

"The training of native women as nurses, too, has recently been added to the work of the mission hospital, fifty four having already graduated from our training school in Kyoto, and twenty-six being now under instruction there. Their success in hospital, family, and district nursing, and their wide appreciation by the people and by the church, afford proof that this feature of the work was not undertaken a day too soon, and emphasizes the importance of encouraging such work in other fields. The trained American nurse, therefore, with positive Christian faith, knowledge of the Scriptures, and spirit of consecration, has become important as an associate of the medical missionary in the foreign field.

Another missionary relates this incident: "Said a wounded soldier to me in one of the hospitals, before I had time to introduce myself or my message: 'Are you a Christian missionary? I am glad you have come.' More than one of the hospital surgeons or other officials gave this testimony unasked: 'Other things being equal, we prefer Chrtstian nurses, as they are more faithful and patient than others. Un-Christian nurses are very active when their superiors are about, but at other times they are indolent and careless. It seems to make no difference to a Christian whether she is under watch or not!'"

Medical missionary work is as yet in its infancy. Laborers in the field confidently believe that the day is not far distant when the army of workers in the spiritual vineyard will be reinforced by many godly men and women of Japanese birth, trained in medicine, who will go about ministering both soul and body. The following verses from the pen of a missionary poet, fitly describes the office of the medical missionary:

He touched her hand and the fever left her.
He touched her hand, as He only can,
With the wondrous skill of the Great Physician,
With the tender touch of the Son of Man;
And the fever pain in the throbbing temples
Died out, with the flush on brow and cheek.
And the lips that had been so parched and burning
Trembled with thanks that she could not speak.
And the eyes, where the fever light had faded,
Looked up, by her grateful tears made dim,
And she rose and ministered to her household,
She rose and ministered unto Him.

THE EFFECTIVE SOCIETY.

S gestions on the Christian Endeavor ›pic for the week Beginning Oct. 13. ılatians 6 : 6-10.

HOW may our society do better work? That is the question for discussion this week. Each society may furnish its answer to the question as far as it is individually concerned. The work of the several committees will speak for itself, and the society must judge whether it has been earnest or perfunctory. The aims and objects of the society are clearly defined, and there can be no difficulty in ascertaining whether they are being fulfilled. If they are not, the cause of the hindrance should be ascertained and promptly removed—even at the cost of personal feeling. The work is the main consideration, and nothing should be allowed to retard it. What this the individual societies may be expected to perform, as they are guided by their knowledge of the facts. The duty will vary according to circumstances. But there is one aspect of the matter which will apply to all. It is the conviction that the value of any organization is determined by the value of its component members. As the strength of a chain is the strength of its separate links, and no more, so an organization, however perfect and wisely planned, is effective only as far as its individual members are efficient. The spirituality and energy of the society are not increased by association, but remain at the mean temperature of the members. The conclusion from this fact is that the true way for promoting the usefulness of the society is to foster the growth of the Christ-spirit in the souls of the individual members. How much the society may do in this work is proved by experience. The very atmosphere seems charged with spiritual force when many earnest souls are present. The individual, fighting his own private and peculiar battle with his own besetting sin and with temptations around him, derives new courage and fresh energy from contact with others who are enrolled in the same service and engaged in the same conflict. The ideal society is one in which each brings his contribution of strength to the common stock and gains new strength for himself. The corrupting influences of the world in which we live and move are counteracted by such association, and the light within is fed with the oil of the Spirit. Mutual help is given and received, and the burden becomes lighter through loving sympathy. The aggressive influence of the society grows in the same way. Organization can never afford to lose sight of the individual. It would be mischievous if it became a relief from duty. Christ has a claim on the best efforts of every one of his followers, and would not be satisfied if any transferred his duty to an organization. That the society should do this or that, should never be a plea for indolence or cowardice. The society will do better work when each member is more active in Christ's service, more prompt to avail himself of opportunities for labor, and more keenly intent on discharging fully his own personal responsibility to his Master.

HOW TO CONQUER DOUBT.

It is said of a famous preacher that whenever he was troubled with sceptical doubts and questions, he used to go down into the slums of the city to preach to the poorest and to the worst, with the invariable result that his faith was strengthened. A Bible Zenana worker, whose eldest child, sweet and beloved, had been taken away by death, was greatly tried in her faith, but she stood the strain by trying to explain to her heathen sisters that God is love and that he does nothing but what is right.

THE CROWN OF THE YEAR.

O COME to the beautiful woodland,
Where sunlight and shadow will fall,
Where breezes coquette with the blossoms,
And locusts to crickets will call.

Come sit on my carpet of mosses,
Where showers of leaves will come down,
Forget all life's burdensome crosses
Beneath autumn's radiant crown.

Let me bring you a lap-full of acorns
And plumes of the fair golden-rod,
And sumac, and lichens, and daisies,
That tell of the goodness of God,

Come list to the plashing of waters,
That sparkle and dance in the glen,
Come list to the birds that are singing,
And you shall be happy again.

Dwell not on the grief of to-morrow,
Be glad in the joy that is here,
Be glad in the sweetness of autumn,
The glorious crown of the year.

LET DOWN YOUR NETS.

LAUNCH out into the deep,
The awful depths of a world's despair;
Hearts that are breaking and eyes that weep,
Sorrow and ruin and death are there,
And the sea is wide, and the pitiless tide
Bears on its bosom—away,
Beauty and youth in relentless ruth
To its dark abyss for aye—for aye,
But the Master's voice comes over the sea,
"Let down your nets for a draught" for me!
He stands in our midst on our wreck-strewn strand,
And sweet and royal is his command.
His pleading call is to each—to all;
And whenever the royal call is heard,
There hang the nets of the royal Word.
Trust to the nets and not to your skill
Trust to the royal Master's will.
Let down your net each day, each hour,
For the word of a king is a world of power,
And the King's own voice comes over the sea.
"Let down your nets for a draught for me!"

"GOD GIVETH THE INCREASE."

SOW thou thy seed in the morning,
And water it often with tears,
And pray that the time for reaping;
Will come in the future years.
For the gleaning wait with patience,
And from field of unfruitful sod,
Will come the sweet assurance,
"That the increase cometh from God."

Speak words of love to the erring,
And plead with gentle breath,
And trust while you are praying,
To save a soul from death.
The truth may pass unheeded,
And care not for love nor rod.
Say, when thou sendest a message,
"The increase cometh from God."

Trust, then, in his blest promise,
Grieve not when you see no sign
Of fruit from the fields where your're toiling,
Or life from gifts of thine.
No effort will be forgotten.
Though you rest beneath the sod,
And others may gather the harvest.
"Yet the increase will come from God."

THE CLUE TO THE VISION.

The Explanation Given by the Angel to Daniel a Clue to the Interpretation of the Later Visions of the Prophet.

BY GEO. A. PEMBER, M.A.*

DANIEL was informed by the angel that the pleadings of God with the Jews during the Four Hundred and Ninety Years described, (Daniel 9: 24), under the figure of seventy sevens should be made to yield six results, which are given as follows:—

1. To shut up the transgression. 2. To seal up sins. 3. To cover iniquity. 4. To bring in everlasting righteousness. 5. To seal up vision and prophet. 6. To anoint a Holy of Holies.

Now, we may divide these six consequences into two classes: for the first three are concerned with the removal of sin, and the last three with the bringing in of righteousness. And the latter will be found to correspond, each to each, to the former.

"To shut up the transgression." That is, to arrest and restrain it, so that it can no longer work and spread. The article, probably, indicates the whole course of Israel's transgression, or "breaking away" from God.

"To seal up sins." The sins are the symptoms or proofs of the revolt, and the figure of sealing is connected with that of shutting up in prison, or restraining. So Darius seals the stone, which is put at the mouth of the lions' den, with his own signet and with that of his lords. The sealing up of sins, consequently, signifies their restraint under safe cusdody. There is a good illustration of both figures, and, probably, a clue to the interpretation of the passage, in the twentieth chapter of the Revelation, where an angel, after binding Satan and casting him into the Abyss, shuts him up and sets a seal upon him, that he may deceive the nations no more.

"To cover iniquity." That is, according to the well known Scriptural figure, to make reconciliation or atonement for it, to expiate it by sacrifice. While the previous clauses refer to the members of the Jewish nation which will perish during the refining process, these words speak of another way of removing sin, and point to the Holy Seed that will be saved. Of course, the reference to expiation is not to be understood directly of what Christ did upon the Cross, but of the application of it to the Jewish people, which will not take place until the close of the age. For Jews as a people there is no expiation in this dispensation: if an individual would have the benefit of the Saviour's death in the present time, he must resign his nationality, and become a member of Christ, in whom is neither Jew nor Greek. But, when the Body of Christ has been completed, then the Jewish nation shall look on him whom they pierced, and mourn for him; "and in that day there shall be a fountain opened to the House of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem"—that is, to Jews as Jews—"for sin and uncleanness."

We come to the second group of results: "To bring in everlasting righteousness." When the transgression is shut up and sins are sealed, then everlasting righteousness shall be brought in. This will be done by the introduction of the new covenant, in accordance with which God will no longer write upon tables of stone, but put his law in the inward parts of his people, and write it in their hearts.

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

NADJA'S PILGRIM FRIENDS ABOUT TO SET OUT FOR KIEF.

CHAPTER XII.

Nadjda's Flight.

WHEN Nadja at last became conscious, the morning sun was shining full on her face. She stirred uneasily on the grass. The return to a full knowledge of what had happened occupied a few minutes of the most exquisite pain, and she could not at first say whether it was pain of body or of mind. She felt numbed and stupid, and although the air was warm and pleasant, to her it was cold and raw. Her ankles and wrists ached with an almost intolerable pain, her mouth and throat were parched. She opened her eyes slowly to the blinding flood of light and looked on a scene so peaceful and calm that it surely could not have been the scene of the fearful storm and the still more fearful human passions of a few hours ago. It could not have been a dream, else why was she here? Why were her wrists raw and bleading? What was all that blood on her dress? And then her heart beat wildly. Where was her father? Why had he left her here alone? She rose on one elbow and looked about her. What was that lying there? What were those wet red stains on the sand beside it?"

"Father, father?" she cried, "Is it you? Father, what has happened. Come to me."

Mutely and terror-stricken she crawled from the grass over to the sand where the dead man lay. She gazed on him with horror. She touched his cold hands, his colder face: she felt his heart, it had ceased to beat forever. There was the awful gaping wound in the neck. Who had done this thing? What had happened? She knelt beside the dead body and chafed the hands, and tied a handkerchief round the gash in the neck. She could not think and thought.

And then the impulse to fly seized her and it grew stronger and stronger until it became irresistible. But whither? Vladimir had told her that she should go to Kief. She was all alone now in the world. Vladimir was gone. Mikhail was gone. Her father who had loved her in his own way was [illegible] and gazed at the rigid face before she could say the fearful word—"dead."

Springing to her feet she thought for a moment with hands pressed to her throbbing temples. Then bathing her stained hands and burning wrists in a pool of water, she turned her back on the fearsome sands and plunged into the [illegible] wards. It seemed as though she followed the path instinctively, and her progress along it was one of mad speed. She reached the old "izba." There stood the chair as it had been placed the night before, on the door lay the book of the ordeal. The face of the Wonder-Worker was cold and impassive as ever, and she shivered as she glanced at it for a moment.

She entered her room, her mind made up to fly. Kief, Kief, refuge, refuge, rang through her brain. She tore off her blood-stained dress, and lighting a fire burned it to ashes. She hastily rummaged through her little store of belongings and tied up in a small bundle what she would require. It was a relief to her that Grisha did not come in, he was doubtless looking after the cattle. A little purse with a few silver roubles in it that her mother had left her she put in her pocket. And then with tears blinding her eyes she went to a secret corner that only she knew about, and took from it some withered rose leaves and a few scrappy letters, the letters carefully tied with ribbon. She stood looking at these shabby memorials of a love that was dead, as though debating something with herself, but at last she made up her mind, and, kissing them passionately, consigned them to the fire, the weird thought striking her with what strange ingredients that flame had been fed. Then taking up her bundle and averting her head from the icon, passed out of the cottage, carefully closing the door.

It was still early morning and no one was astire yet, not even the hired man who worked the ferry.

So much the better for her purpose, she thought, and running down to the river unlocked the fasfenings of the clumsy ferry-boat, and, jumping on board, set it running on its chain across the river.

It was over sixty miles to the holy city, and the broad steppe lay before her shining in the morning sun. At any other time she would have taken infinite delight in the rich broidery of flowers that stretched all around her right to the horizon. She would have luxuriated in the pleasant May warmth and in the even morning light, in the matchless melody of the larks and the chirp and hum of myriads of busy insects; but now she went on her way unheeding. On both sides and in front of her there was not a soul visible. She dared not look back at the village crowning the opposite bank—she might see some one.

All through the morning she walked, and little by little the calm and peace of the steppe filtered into her soul, and the troubles, the ineffable sorrows that were there were soothed.

Ah, she was a true Russian. There is no one of that wonderful race who does not find solace and elevation in its illimitable steppes. And if his march is towards Kief the better. In the ear of every Russian, from the frozen shores of the Arctic to the vine-clad hills of the Crimea, Kief is a word that fills his mind full of the ideas of religion and poetry, and appeals to everything in him that is supersensuous and remote from the troubles and cares of his life. No steppes are so beloved by the Russians as those around Kief; they are level almost as the sea; they invite one to go on and on, and evoke limitless reveries of melancholy and hope.

As the day advanced Nadja met an occasional peasant driving a bullock cart, and once or twice a boy herding a flock of weather-beaten sheep. These people accosted her kindly, and would have stopped on the road to chat, but she hurried past them, never daring to rest when anyone was in sight. A gourd full of water which she carried supplied her with drink, and some rye bread was her food, but neither hunger nor thirst distressed her, and she pressed on.

Towards evening she skirted a village, and a group of merry girls in a field ran up to her, and asked her where she came from, and whither she was bound.

"From the other side of the river," she replied; "and I am going to Kief on pilgrimage."

When they saw her sweet face, and heard her gentle, sad voice, and noticed how she walked lame, they wondered that she was all alone, and that she did not wear the bast sandals of the pilgrims which keep the feet cool.

"Stop the night in our village," one bright-faced girl begged her; "Father is the priest, and he loves the pilgrims."

"Or, if you like, you can come to our house," said another; "father is the elder, and we will let you have warm water for your tired feet, and milk and eggs, and fresh bread."

"Perhaps," said a girl who had not yet spoken, "perhaps you would like to go on a little, and join some pilgrims who are resting for the night beside a little river about two versts farther. There are two farmhouses near, and some haystacks. The pilgrims were here an hour ago, and are good people, and will be glad to see you."

"Yes, yes," said Nadja, relieved, "I will go on. God bless you all!" She kissed them, and her scalding tears fell on their pure young faces.

With slow and halting steps, she continued on her journey, now so weary a journey, each verst longer than the verst before it. It was growing dark. At last she saw the lights of the pilgrims' camp fire. She had thought to have avoided all intercourse with every one, but the fatigues of the long road, and the fearful strain of the previous night, had well-nigh exhausted her. Poor Nadja felt ashamed of her hesitancy in joining the pilgrims. She stood and watched them, wondering curiously what sort of people they were. There were ten of them, she counted, six men and four women. They were not from hereabouts, she was certain. The dress of the women which she could make out told her that much. They were from the north probably as they wore such warm things. At last mustering all her courage, she approached their circle. They are pilgrims, she thought, and they are going to the holy places; their hearts surely are soft; they will remember the example of the blessed Saviour.

In the gathering dusk they saw her approach, with her beautiful, sad face and gracious air of humility, and when they noticed her, sad and humble, they one and all rose from about the fire and gave her a warm welcome, and wished her a good evening and good health.

How kind they were to her! Had the quest they were on smoothed over their rude rough natures, or was it the influence of the lovely golden-haired stranger who had entered their midst?

They deserve a word of notice, these guileless pilgrims, wandering towards Kief. They will not accompany us through our story, but they are some of the best people we shall meet, you and I, as we journey together.

Nadja was quite right: they had come from the north, from the banks of the far-distant Vyatka, away beyond Kazan on the Volga, and had left their homes in mid-winter, braving innumerable dangers and unheard-of hardships, to reach the shrines and relics so dear to the heart and imagination of every true Russian. Are we to blame these simple and untaught peasants if the pure spiritual truths of the Gos[pel], the great truths of the equable omnip[resence] of the Lord throughout his whole [uni]verse, became to them vague and unre[al]? Let us by all means wish there was gre[ater] light, and work for the diffusion of it: [but] let us not condemn, or wish to see extingu[ished], the faint flicker that lightens the almost hyperborean darkness of that land.

All through their long journey—and s[ome] pilgrims come from Archangel and the [re]mote provinces of Siberia—the pilgrims [are] treated kindly by every one they meet, and the poor among them are furnished [with] abundance to eat and drink. With [his] gourd of water, his tattered sandals of [bast] or birch bark, his wallet and staff [the] tramps steadily along to the holy city, and when he returns, he returns a privil[eged] and sanctified being. He has expiated [his] sins. Here is the deadly error.

The leader of the little band of pilg[rims] which Nadja had now joined was an old man of seventy, who had been on pilg[rim]age twice before, and enjoyed a great r[epu]tation for sanctity among the village[s on] the Viatka. He approached Nadja and held out his hand.

"Daughter," he said, "you are welcome among us. We are resting here for the night; and if you rest with us we will be glad. You look tired. Eat a bit with us."

They opened their wallets, and on a [clean] cloth on the grass they spread their [rye] bread and onions, and salt, and their gourd of pure water from the stream that murmured past them at their feet. The [red] light gleamed on their strong bronzed [and] faces. Then they all crossed themselves devoutly. Old Makari, the leader, [read] a psalm, and they ate their supper in silence. Nadja tried hard to join in the pleasant prattle that followed, the talk about the little excitements and incidents of the road, but she could not feel at ease, and relapsed into silence. To some questions which the woman asked her she gave as straightforward answers as she could; others she declared not answer, and she hated to lie.

"Daughter," said old Makari, "we will not bother you with our questions. For ourselves we are simple people, and ever glad may know who we are, and what we are, and whence we came, and whither we go; but we feel we have no right to bother you with questions if you would rather not answer them. I remember once I was out shooting foxes along the Viatka. It was winter, and as night was coming on and we were far from any village, my companion and I thought we would rest where we were for the night. So we cut down some pine branches and kindled a great fire and supper, and lay down to sleep. It was not very long before we heard a dog bark.

"We sat up, and looking in the direction of the sound, we noticed a great wolf coming approaching the fire, and behind him a young man carrying a gun, and with a long dagger in his belt. He came right forward to the fire and smiled, and told us he had lost his way, but discovering our footsteps in the snow, he had followed them until he saw the fire. Would we take him in for the night, he asked us, and his friends would be sure to follow later. Of course we took him in. He needn't have asked.

"We sat up, all night together, and kept on a roaring crackling fire.

"Just at day-break his friends came up, blowing their horns and making a tremendous rumpus, and very glad they were to find him. He asked me in what village I lived, and what was my name. I told him, of course. Would you believe it? Two days the "Uriadnik" came running into my "izba" to say that he had a letter for me. 'A letter for me!' I said, 'I have never had a letter in my life.' 'Well, here is,' said the 'Uriadnik.' I learnt it off by heart. 'Thank you, friend,' said the letter; 'Thank you, friend Makari, for a jolly night's lodging and excellent company. May you live long, and catch many fishes, Constantine.' 'And he told me to give you this,' said the 'Uriadnik,' handing me a magnificent title, that I haven't dared to use since, it is so lovely. Now what do you think of that? Well, I told you this story because who knows if our little Nadja here isn't a grand duchess in disguise. Indeed, I don't think there is much disguise, for she quite looks it."

Every one laughed at the old man's pleasantry. Even Nadja herself smiled. "I'm not a grand duchess," she said, "only a peasant's daughter."

"Well, maybe we love you all the better for that," was Makari's rejoinder.

Family and Home Circle

The Homes of Nazareth.

Characteristics of the old Galilean Town, as they Appear To-day—Humble Dwellings and Simple Rural Customs.

IT is not made clear in history, sacred or secular, how the word "Nazarene" came to be regarded as a term of disrepute nor how the ancient town in the province of Galilee incurred the opprobrium hinted at in the Gospels. (John 1: 46.) It is certain, however, that the people of Nazareth were loftily regarded by those of Judea, probably because they were a rough set of country folk, brown-skinned and brawny in limb, and speaking a rude uncouth dialect. Near proximity to heathen neighbors may have given to the town a reputation for irreligion; and indeed, it seems that the people of the place adopted from the start an attitude toward the Saviour—threatening to kill him, and twice expelling him—that is not unlikely that the evil repute was deserved, so persistently hostile was their course toward him and his ministry that he wrought few miracles among them (Matt. 13: 58), and ultimately left them to make his abode in the quieter and more hospitable town of Capernaum.

Outwardly, there is probably little change in the Nazareth of to-day from the town as it was in the time of Christ. Beyond there, among the barren-looking hills, are patches of fig and olive trees and pasturage of grain-fields. In the valley about the town, which is well cultivated, are corn-fields with gardens, cactus hedges and orchards in full bearing. At Nazareth, all the fruits of Palestine—the orange, pomegranate, fig, olive and grape—ripen and attain a rare perfection.

The village itself, most of the houses are substantially built of stone and look neat and comfortable. A typical dwelling of the common class is that shown in the photograph. At the doorway stands the housewife adjusting her head-dress before setting out with her little daughter on some domestic mission—probably the gathering of fuel. Her garments of coarse cotton are anything but graceful or extravagant; yet they are suited to her humble station in life, and she is probably just as contented as though attired in silks and decked with jewels. And she is a substantial housewife, too, for her little one is neatly clad and well shod, even though the indulgent mother goes barefoot. Poor as is the dwelling, it is no doubt very dear to this little family of Nazarites, and the children in their daily walks and sports tread the same paths and view the same sights as did the boy Jesus, for it was to Nazareth that he "was brought up." (Luke 4: 16.)

Four-fifths of the population of Nazareth are now Christian. They are thrifty and industrious, and like the people of Bethlehem are noted for their fine physical appearance. At the "Fountain of the Virgin," whereon still be seen daily the matrons and maidens of Nazareth drawing water, as their predecessors did eighteen centuries ago. Carpenter shops, too, are there in which the tools, benches and other appointments are of the same simple, primitive character as those that were in the workshop of "Joseph the Carpenter" for methods of labor as well as social customs change slowly in the East, and some seemingly never at all.

The villagers themselves, however, there has been written half a century of wonderful transformation and the process of change is still progressing. Christianity is revered where its founder was assaulted and condemned. Boys' schools and girls' orphanages are training the young, and the Moslem population has been utterly distanced by the moral and intellectual progress of the Christian element. The Christian homes are, most of them, models of cleanliness, and their children the best of sons and daughters.

Losing Patience.

One of the commonest of faults, and one we seldom give due heed to, is the losing of patience and self-control. The petty irritations, says a reverend writer, are too much for the average person. They take all the pleasantness from your face and all the sweetness from your temper. They fill you with irritability and harshness, lead you to indulge in false judgments, and oftentimes in wrong conclusions and accusations. In such moods you are no comfort to yourself or anybody else. You do not recommend religion. You are peevish, sour, intolerant, and intolerable, mean and waspish, and altogether unlovely. It is only a trifling matter that has annoyed you, and is thus poisoning your peace, and fairness, and happiness, and blotting your Christian character. How needful, then, that you keep watch against these little irritations; that you be constantly on guard lest they betray you in an unguarded moment into an unseemly state of mind and an unchristian behavior. Bear in mind that your most positive influence resides in these minor demonstrations, and pray for that Divine keeping which will lift you above all such insignificant tormentors.

Japanese Women and Flowers.

A love of flowers is one of the leading characteristics of the women of Japan. Their dresses, their kerchiefs, their fans, their rugs, their pictures, and even the porcelain they eat from are covered with perfect flower designs. They have an adoration for buds and blooms, and this is well since it is their duty to decorate the home and make it attractive. They have this art cultivated to such an extent that they have special methods and systems of arranging flowers. Two systems are known as the "Eusin" and "Sekishin," and consist of a series of bendings and twistings of branches and leaves into odd shapes. The "Korin," another method, is a mode of cutting away the branches or leaves and grouping the blossoms. Some of the Japanese women's favorite flowers have odd and fanciful names, such as, for example, the hamanasue (rose), the setzashi (hawthorn), satsuki (azalea), kakitsubata (iris), fuyoo (rose), robia (all-spice), sazankwa (camelia). The floral parties of Japan are famous the world over. Certain gowns are worn on special festivals, and even the music and dramatic entertainment is dictated by the season of the flowers. The apple-blossom fetes are among Japan's chiefest attractions.

Ostentation in Dress.

At the present time, when the subject of dress is occuping a far too prominent place in the minds of many people in society, and when peculiarities and bewildering eccentricities of dress reform are seen in many quarters, it is interesting to cast a retrospective glance at the vagaries of the past in the same connection. An old French moralist, declaimed in 1586 against the prevailing fashions, and especially that of ladies carrying mirrors so that they might constantly view themselves.

In Edward VI.'s time, a lady with a wen on her neck covered it by a patch. From that time patches became the mode. A hundred years later they were cut into all kinds of fantastic figures; owls, rings, suns, moons, and even a coach and horses. A dauphhin of France had a high shoulder. This gave rise to "full bottomed" wigs. Down to the reign of William and Mary, little children of the upper classes wore wigs, but barbers did not then become hair dressers. Comfit boxes were great signs of ostentation, and were the rage in France before snuff-boxes took their place. All carried them on all occasions. Good old Richard Baxter thought it necessary to write a book against the vice of extravagant dress. He also had a later work on the same topic entitled: "New Instructions unto Youth for their Behavior."

IT PAYS.

IT pays to wear a smiling face
And laugh our troubles down
For all our little trials wait
Our laughter or our frown.
Beneath the magic of a smile
Our doubts will fade away,
As melts the frost in early spring
Beneath the sunny ray.

It pays to make a worthy cause,
By helping it, our own;
To give the current of our lives
A true and noble tone.
It pays to comfort heavy hearts,
Oppressed with dull despair,
And leave in sorrow-darkened lives
A gleam of brightness there.

It pays to give a helping hand
To eager, earnest youth,
To note, with all their waywardness,
Their courage and their truth;
To strive with sympathy and love
Their confidence to win;
It pays to open wide the heart
And "let the sunshine in."

BREAKING A CHILD'S WILL.

TO break a child's will is to crush out for the time being, and so far to destroy, the child's privilege of free choice; it is to force him to an action against his choice, instead of inducing him to choose in the right direction. A child's will is his truest personality; the expression of his will in a free choice is the highest expression of his personality. And a child's personality is to be held sacred by God's representative who is over the child, even as God himself holds sacred the personality of every human being created in the image of God.

A child's will ought to be strong for right-doing. If it be not so at the start, it is the parent's duty to guide, or train it accordingly. But to break or crush a child's will is inconsistent with the education and training of that will. A conflict between a parent and a child, where the only question is whose will shall yield to the other, is, after all, neither more nor less than a conflict of brute force.

Whether, in any instance, the will of the parent be set on having the child commit some repulsive crime against which the child's moral nature recoils, or whether the will of the parent be set on the child's reciting a Bible text or saying a prayer, the mere conflict of wills as a conflict of wills, is a conflict of brute force: and in such a conflict neither party ought to succeed,—for success in any such case is always a failure. If the parent really wills that the child shall do right, the parent's endeavor should be to have the child will in the same direction. Merely to force one will into subjection to the other is, however, an injury both to the one who forces and the one who submits.

Over-strictness with Children.

Young parents who are exceptionally conscientious and exceptionally desirous of being wise and faithful in the discharge of their parental duties, are liable to err in the direction of over-doing in the training of their children. It is not that they are lacking in love and tenderness toward their little ones, or that they are naturally inclined to severity as disciplinarians; but it is their mistaken view of the methods and limitations of wise child-training impels them to an injudicious course of watchful strictness with their children, even while that course runs counter to their affections and desires as parents. Their very love and fidelity cause them to harm their children by over-doing in their training.

Ill Tempered Babies

are not desirable in any home. Insufficient nourishment produces ill temper. Guard against fretful children by feeding nutritious and digestible food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the most successful of all infant foods.

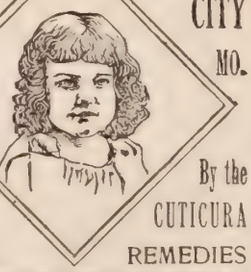
THE PRIZE BABY OF KANSAS CITY MO.



Cured of Disfiguring ECZEMA By the CUTICURA REMEDIES

Our baby when three weeks old was badly afflicted with Eczema. Her head, arms, neck, limbs, and nearly every joint in her body was raw and bleeding when we concluded to try CUTICURA REMEDIES. We began with CUTICURA (ointment) and CUTICURA SOAP, and after the first application we could see a change. After we had used them one week some of the sores had healed entirely, and ceased to spread. In less than a month, she was free from scales and blemishes, and to-day has as lovely skin and hair as any child. She was shown at the Grange Fair, and took a premium as the prettiest baby, over sixteen others. MR. & MRS. PARK, 1609 Belleview Ave., Kan. City.

AID WOMEN WORKERS.

harity Organization Society's rk-rooms for Unskilled Female La- or and How they are Conducted.

NE of the greatest of the difficulties that face poor women during the summer-time in New York—women who are either responsible for the support of their families, or who find it necessary to supplement the wages of the principal breadwinner—is that of finding any kind of work to do. This hardship is caused largely by the prolonged absence from the city of families who have work to give to women, and who are themselves in the country, or at the seashore, and upon whom many of the needy ones depend for work.

The suffering among such working-women and their children is consequently often very severe. The Work-rooms for Unskilled Women, which were established at Prospect Place, New York City, by the Charity Organization Society a few months since, were opened for the double purpose of furnishing work to such deserving persons all the year round, and of training women in sewing and other branches of domestic work, so as to enable them to earn better wages than heretofore. It is necessary that these work-rooms should be in a measure self-supporting, as the whole maintenance of them is too heavy a burden upon the treasury of the society.

The method, therefore, has been adopted of selling tickets at fifty cents each, or books containing twenty-six tickets each (giving the woman steady work for one woman), which are to be given to applicants for relief, instead of money, thus preventing them in the way of earning some wages, sufficient, however, to give them temporary relief, rather than become habitual recipients of unearned gifts. These tickets will give each woman a day's work and a meal, and she will receive in return for her labor, forty cents' worth of food or clothing, in addition to the meal given to herself. The food thus obtained is ample to care for a family of five for a day.. These tickets are used by the societies and churches, but many of them have suspend operations in the summer, this further reducing the resources of the poor women.

The work-rooms have a capacity for three hundred women and there are many who need the advantages. Tickets can be discriminatingly distributed by many of the agencies of the city that are open all summer, and the Charity Organization Society solicits ans to enable it to distribute such tickets the women who need the work and relief, either through the District Offices of the Society or through the numerous societies that co-operate with it. The experiment has been successful thus far, the daily attendance averaging from about the first warm weather, to 130 or 140 in the winter, but its benefits might be still more widely extended.

NEW HOSPITAL IN JERUSALEM.

Steady progress is being made with the erection of the new mission hospital at Jerusalem. The hospital will have beds for forty patients, and will also have an out-patients' department. It is outside the city, on the freehold property of the London Jews' Society—known as the "Sanatorium"—about three-quarters of a mile from Jaffa Gate. The Medical Mission at Damascus will shortly be opened. Dr. Masterman will take temporary charge of the work for a year, at the expiration of which time a permanent missionary may be appointed.

The New Church Hymnal!

New, yet old! The popular and loved songs are the best. In the quiet gloom of a lantern service a congregation will sing the old favorites with a vim and power so wonderful that every pastor will recognize that "a new church hymnal" has been discovered. For genuine, hearty congregational singing there is absolutely nothing to compare to the Stereopticon.

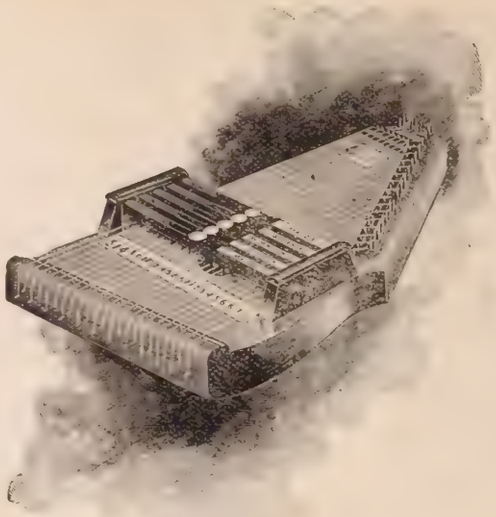
THE AUTOHARP.



Autoharp Cases.
Autoharp Hammers.
Autoharp Bags.
Autoharp Strings.
Autoharp Brushes.

Take your choice. While these Autoharps are only two of our many varieties illustrated in our beautiful story, "How the Autoharp Captured the Family" (sent free to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers), they are the popular ones. The prices are just right, and the capacity of the instruments is such that they are sure to give satisfaction. We guarantee satisfaction or money returned.

Why should you get an Autoharp? Because you can learn to play the popular music—Operas, Hymns, Waltzes, Marches, Galops, Mazurkas, Schottisches, Yorkes, College Songs—almost at sight. No teacher is necessary, as our instruction book is complete. Our music is a new figure notation. You do not have to know a single note of the old system. It is easily tuned, and keeps in tune a long time. Never gets out of order.

Style 2 3-4 (Upper illustration). Two keys—F and C allowing beautiful modulation. It has 23 strings and five bars producing the following five chords: C, F and Bb Major and C and G Seventh. Its appearance is handsome—imitation ebony bars and bar supports, forming a contrast to the light redwood sounding board. It measures 18 1-2 inches long by 10 inches wide. Packed in a nice box, including instruction book containing 22 pieces of music, a music rack, imitation tortoise shell pick, brass spiral pick, and a tuning key. Price, $5.00.

Style 2 7-8 (Lower illustration). Two keys, F and C, with the relative Minors, allowing many most beautiful modulations and musical effects. Has 28 strings, seven bars, producing the following seven chords: C, F and Bb Major, C and G Seventh, D and A Minor. In appearance same as 2 3-4. The size, however, is larger, measuring 20 inches long and 11 1-2 inches broad. This gives more volume, and as it has more strings and chord bars, should be very seriously considered. Packed in a nice box, including instruction book containing 24 pieces of music, a music rack, imitation tortoise shell pick, brass spiral pick, and a tuning key. Price, $7.50.

Money must be sent with order. Express prepaid to any Express Office in U. S. Send for Catalogue. Mailed free.

We Direct Special Attention to the following Remarkable Statement:

For many years I suffered from Catarrh of the head and throat, which destroyed my hearing, and for twenty-five years I was so deaf that I could not understand conversation at all. Could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear against it. I had tried every known remedy, and nothing had ever given me the slightest relief. Last summer I obtained Dr. Moore's treatment, and had not used it three weeks until my hearing began to improve, and has steadily improved ever since, and now I can hear common conversation across a room without difficulty; can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room, 30 feet away, with the door closed, and I think I am entirely cured and my hearing permanently restored. I urge all who are afflicted as I was, to obtain Dr. Moore's treatment.

UNGER'S DEATH-ROLL IN ARMENIA.

A Costly yet Incomplete List of Forty-Six Victims Received—The Urgent Need of Aid—Mr. Howard Hastening to Van—The Relief Fund Growing.

Please Read: Matthew 25: 31-46.

WHEN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of its readers, Mr. William Willard Howard, its commissioner to relieve the persecuted and hunger-smitten peasants of Armenia, will be speeding his destination. On arriving in London he crossed the Channel, and, hurrying by rail over the Continent, will reach the Turkish capital within a few days thence via the Bosphorus and Black Sea to Trebizond by steamer, and from Trebizond he will penetrate to the interior of Armenia by such means of transportation as are at hand. Mr. Howard goes on an extremely perilous mission, but he is strengthened and encouraged in the knowledge that an over-shadowing Providence will care for him until his work is done. We all soon expect to hear from him on Armenian soil, and within a very short time he will have reached Van, organized his committee, and begun the practical work of relief, as outlined in last week's issue of this journal.

We trust to receive the approval and hearty support of all our readers in this great work of Christian charity that has been undertaken. Every week brings letters and advices, showing that the magnitude of the need has in no wise been exaggerated and that unless the sympathetic readers of the Master come to the rescue with their prayers and gifts, there will be starvation and woe in Armenia during the coming winter.

Already a number of our readers have sent us sympathetic letters, enclosing contributions for the work. The cry of these homeless and exiled people has touched many hearts on this side of the Atlantic, and it will be strange indeed if there should not follow such an outpouring of help as will convince the oldest Christian nation that the spirit of Him whom they worship has not died out in the world. Especially gratifying is the interest shown in Dr. Grace N. Kimball's good work, which has awakened the warmest appreciation. Many of the letters received speak of her noble efforts in the highest terms. L. B., Paterson, N. J., in sending $5, writes: "The Lord holds us in trust responsible for the alleviation of these needs, as we are and have been blessed above many nations." "We would like to help Grace N. Kimball in her work among the Armenians," write Mr. and Mrs. A. Godbold." Another friend in New Jersey ($5) writes: "I want to help them, and have thought of the words, 'Inasmuch as you did it not unto one of the least of these.'" And so with many other letters, in each of which comes along with the gift a prayer, that it may be blessed to the relief of poor sufferer in distant Armenia.

Meanwhile, until more substantial relief arrives, the work initiated by the missionaries in Van themselves is being heroically continued. In a recent letter Dr. Kimball writes:

"We need it (the money) desperately. The industrial relief work is an established fact and is beyond all my fondest anticipations. I have 345 heads of families registered and at work, representing over 1,500 souls. I estimate that I could keep that number going on $125 a week, and also have a large quantity of much needed clothing turned out by their labor. The hardest thought is to decline to give work to the hundreds that crowd us daily. And besides the delay means famine. We are worse off than Sassoun now."

Mrs. Raynolds, who is one of Dr. Kimball's associates, writes that the missionary relief workers had received permission and hoped shortly to go to Semal (one of the stricken districts). They intended to take with them material for clothing and set the women to sewing as soon as possible. Mr. Cole (a missionary) had secured permission from the Bitlis "vali" to take 200 oxen from Moosh plain, with millet seed into the country districts, with the view of helping the poor peasants.

The most ruinous phase of the present condition of things is wholesale exile. Thousands of Armenian villagers, unable to endure the hard privation longer, or to see their wives and children starve, leave their ruined homes and bare fields and pour into the neighboring cities, unsheltered and hungry. There are now scores of deserted or half-ruined villages and monasteries that have been seized by the Kurds. Driven to despair by all these outrages, the Armenian villager is so stunned that life as a man and a Christian seems no longer possible.

Such is the condition of the peasantry, and among the towns-people, whose prosperity depends on that of the villagers, it is equally serious. Not only do they share the misfortunes of the peasantry, but they have peculiar difficulties of their own to contend against.

There are many thousands of families in Van alone in abject and hopeless poverty, because there is no protection to business or the trades. Every day brings to the city of Van heart-rending stories of death from starvation in different parts of the five afflicted provinces, and as the cold weather is at hand the number of tragedies of this description may soon be expected to increase. There is, of course, no official promulgation concerning deaths from this cause, but it is so well-known, and the fact is so obvious to all, that there is no attempt whatever made to hide it.

WILLIAM WILLARD HOWARD.

The Christian Herald Commissioner now en route to Armenia.

From a resident of Moush there has lately been received a letter which more than confirms all that has been stated regarding the widespread suffering and destitution. He writes to friends in England:

"After the departure of the Kurdish tribes, which had perpetrated the massacres of Sassoun, the survivors left their hiding-places. One group of these people settled themselves on the plateaux, in the defiles, and in the forests of Sassoun, whilst the greater part emigrated to Moush, whence they were soon scattered among the Armenian villages of the plain. The Armenians sheltered and fed these emigrants as long as they had the means; but being themselves doubly tried by the want which reigns on all sides, and for the past two years and more, in the country, they soon found it impossible for them to supply the needs of these emigrants. The latter were obliged to move away to the mountains, where they are finding their food from herbs and leaves, or else to beg in the villages, where they are hardly finding a morsel of bread. Here are the name of Armenians who are already dead from hunger: Khacho Sadoyan; Serop Stepanyan; [illegible] daughter of Mardiros; Daniel Korkeyan; Tatar Mikaelyan Nerses, wife of Tamo, and her son Garo; Noureh, daughter of Aveh; Eva, daughter of Sarkis; Hairabed Kevorkian; Arsenag Serop Arsenag Kevork; Mariroos Yeghiayan; Khacheh, daughter of Erko; Farho Doneyan; Khacheh, daughter of Ovsga Eliaz Megerdumian Mariam, daughter of Hagop; Agrout, daughter of Hadjo; Haiganoush, daughter of Markos; Yeghiayan; Soghieh Bedros and Sahag of Osmani-Harten and their sister Eghisseh; Hairabed Kevkyan, aged only eight years, his brother Mikitar, aged twelve years; Kouren, wife of Sako, her son Setrack and her daughter Makeh; Anich, daughter of Sarkis; Seghanik Avedis; Sarineh, daughter of Saverian; Sousanik, daughter of Ohan; Hovo Khamoyan and his female cousin Kouleh; Merkeh Guiro; Khacho Guiragos; Khouto Hagop; Khacho, daughter of Magar Matteos, daughter of Pourlo; Mardo Kaleyan; Maireh, wife of Hacho; Narguis, wife of Agvo; Hatto, wife of Toumo, and her daughter Sabreh.

"The Kurds have taken advantage of the sufferings of the people of Sassoun to carry on a trade in white people. A young Armenian woman of Sassoun, sold as a slave by these Nomads, is now in the village of Molla-Feyat. Another was sold to an inhabitant of the village of Hadji-Osman-Bey, and taken to Diarbekir. A little boy and little girl were bought for 130 piastres of a Kurd named Mehmed; this amount included besides the price of a donkey. There were other instances also of the same character."

AN ARMENIAN REFUGEE IN VAN.

Photographed for The Christian Herald.

William Willard Howard, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner, is a native of Iowa and now in his thirty-sixth year. He received his early training at different schools in that city, and completed his education at Harvard College. His whole life, thus far, has been devoted to literary work, and he has been a contributor to "Harper's Weekly," the "Century Magazine," and a number of other influential and leading publications, besides having a wide and valuable journalistic experience in the field. He went to Armenia in December last, and during a six-months'

A POINT-BLANK QUESTION.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 10: 15, "Is thine heart right?"

WITH mettled horses at full speed, for he was celebrated for fast driving, Jehu, the warrior and king, returns from battle. But seeing Jehonadab, an acquaintance, by the wayside, he shouts "Whoa! whoa!" to the lathered span. Then leaning over to Jehonadab, Jehu salutes him in the words of the text—words not more appropriate for that hour and that place, than for this hour and place: "Is thine heart right?"

I should like to hear of your physical health. Well myself, I like to have everybody else well; and so might ask, is your eyesight right, your hearing right, your nerves right, your lungs right, your entire body right? But I am busy to-day taking diagnosis of the more important spiritual conditions. I should like to hear of your financial welfare. I want everybody to have plenty of money, ample apparel, large storehouse, and comfortable residence; and I might ask, is your business right, your income right, your worldly surroundings right? But what are these financial questions compared with the inquiry as to whether you have been able to pay your debts to God; as to whether you are insured for eternity; as to whether you are ruining yourself by the long-credit system of the soul? I have known men to have no more than one loaf of bread at a time, and, yet to own a government bond of heaven worth more than the whole material universe.

The question I ask you to-day is not in regard to your habits. I make no inquiry about your integrity, or your chastity, or your sobriety. I do not mean to stand on the outside of the gate and ring the bell; but coming up the steps, I open the door and come to the private apartment of the soul; and with the earnestness of a man that must give an account for this day's work, I cry out, O man, O woman immortal, is thine heart right?

I will not insult you by an argument to prove that we are by nature all wrong. If there be a factory explosion, and the smokestack be upset, and the wheels be broken in two, and the engine unjointed, and the ponderous bars be twisted, and a man should look in and say that nothing was the matter, you would pronounce him a fool. Well, it needs no acumen to discover that our nature is all atwist and askew and unjointed. The thing doesn't work right. The biggest trouble we have in the world is with our souls. Men sometimes say that, though their lives may not be just right, their heart is all right. Impossible. A farmer never puts the poorest apples on top of his barrel; nor does the merchant place the meanest goods in his show window The best part of us is our outward life. I do not stop to discuss whether we all fell in Adam, for we have been our own Adam, and have all eaten of the forbidden fruit, and have been turned out of the paradise of holiness and peace; and though the flaming sword that stood at the gate to keep us out has changed position and comes behind to drive us in, we will not go.

The Bible account of us is not exaggerated when it says that we are poor and wretched and miserable and blind and naked. Poor: the wretch that stands shivering on our doorstep on a cold day is not so much in need of bread as we are of spiritual help. Blind: why, the man whose eyes perished in the powder blast, and who for these ten years has gone feeling his way from street to street, is not in such utter darkness as we. Naked: why, there is not one rag of holiness left to hide the shame of our sin. Sick: why, the leprosy has eaten into the head and the heart and the hands and the feet; and the marasmus of an everlasting wasting away has already seized on some of us.

But the meanest thing for a man to do is to discourse about an evil without pointing a way to have it remedied. I speak of the thirst of your hot tongue, only that I may show you the living stream that drops crystalline and sparkling from the Rock of Ages, and pours a river of gladness at your feet. If I show you the rents in your coat, it is only because the door of God's wardrobe now swings open, and here is a robe, white with the fleece of the Lamb of God, and of a cut and make that an angel would not be ashamed to wear. If I snatch from you the black, mouldy bread that you are munching, it is only to give you the bread made out of the finest wheat that grows on the celestial hills, and baked in the fires of the Cross; and one crumb of which would be enough to make all heaven a banquet. Hear it, one and all, and tell it to your friends when you go home, that the Lord Jesus Christ can make the heart right.

First we need a repenting heart. If for the last ten, twenty, or forty years of life, we have been going on in the wrong way, it is time that we turned around and started in the opposite direction. If we offend our friends we are glad to apologize. God is our best friend, and yet how many of us have never apologized for the wrongs we have done him!

There is nothing that we so much need to get rid of as sin. It is a horrible black monster. It polluted Eden. It killed Christ. It has blasted the world. Men keep dogs in kennels, and rabbits in a warren, and cattle in a pen. What a man that would be who would shut them up in his parlor? But this foul dog of sin, and these herds of transgression, we have entertained for many a long year in our heart, which should be the cleanest, brightest room in all our nature. Out with the vile herd! Begone, ye befoulers of an immortal nature! Turn out the beasts and let Christ come in!

A heathen came to an early Christian, who had the reputation of curing diseases. The Christian said, "You must have all your idols destroyed." The heathen gave to the Christian the key to his house, that he might go in and destroy the idols. He battered to pieces all he saw, but still the man did not get well. The Christian said to him, "There must be some idol in your house not yet destroyed." The heathen confessed that there was one idol of beaten gold that he could not bear to give up. After awhile, when that was destroyed, in answer to the prayer of the Christian, the sick man got well.

Many a man has awakened in his dying hour to find his sins all about him. They clambered up on the right side of the bed, and on the left side, and over the headboard, and over the footboard, and horribly devoured the soul.

> Repent! the voice celestial cries,
> Nor longer dare delay;
> The wretch that scorns the mandate dies,
> And meets a fiery day.

Again, we need a believing heart. A good many years ago a weary one went up one of the hills of Asia Minor, and with two logs on his back cried out to all the world, offering to carry their sins and sorrows. They pursued him. They slapped him in the face. They mocked him. When he groaned they groaned. They shook their fists at him. They spat on him. They hounded him as though he were a wild beast. His healing of the sick, his sight-giving to the blind, his mercy to the outcast, silenced not the revenge of the world. His prayers and benedictions were lost in that whirlwind of execration: "Away with him! Away with him!"

Ah! it was not merely the two pieces of wood that he carried: it was the transgressions of the race, the anguish of the ages, the wrath of God, the sorrows of hell, the stupendous interests of an unending eternity. No wonder his back bent. No wonder the blood started from every pore. No wonder that he crouched under a torture that made the sun faint, and the everlasting hills tremble, and the dead rush up in their winding-sheets as he cried: "If it be possible, let this cup pass from me." But the cup did not pass. None to comfort.

There he hangs! What has that hand done that it should be thus crushed in the palm? It has been healing the lame and wiping away tears. What has that foot been doing that it should be so lacerated? It has been going about doing good. Of what has the victim been guilty? Guilty of saving a world. Tell me, ye heavens and earth, was there ever such another criminal? Was there ever such a crime? On that hill of carnage, that sunless day, amid those howling rioters, may not your sins and mine have perished? I believe it. Oh, the ransom has been paid. Those arms of Jesus were stretched out so wide, that when he brought them together again they might embrace the world. Oh, that I might, out of the blossoms of the spring, or the flaming foliage of the autumn, make one wreath for my Lord! Oh, that all the triumphal arches of the world could be swung in one gateway, where the King of Glory might come in! Oh, that all the harps and trumpets and organs of earthly music might, in one anthem, speak his praise!

But what were earthly flowers to him who walketh amid the snow of the white lilies of heaven? What were arches of earthly masonry to him who hath about his throne a rainbow spun out of everlasting sunshine? What were all earthly music to him when the hundred and forty and four thousand on one side, and cherubim and seraphim and archangels stand on the other side, and all the space between is filled with the doxologies of eternal jubilee—the hosanna of a redeemed earth, the hallelujah of unfallen angels, song after song rising about the throne of God and of the Lamb? In that pure, high place, let him hear us. Stop! harps of heaven, that our poor cry may be heard. Oh, my Lord Jesus! it will not hurt thee for one hour to step out from the shining throng. They will make it all up when thou goest back again. Come hither, O blessed One, that we may kiss thy feet. Our hearts, too long withheld, we now surrender into thy keeping. When thou goest back tell it to all the immortals that the lost are found, and let the Father's house ring with the music and the dance.

They have some old wine in heaven, not used except in rare festivities. In this world, those who are accustomed to use wine on great occasions bring out the beverage and say, "This wine is thirty years old," or "forty years old." But the wine of heaven is more than eighteen centuries old. It was prepared at the time when Christ trod the wine-press alone. [illegible] such grievous sinners as we come [illegible] methinks the chamberlain of heaven [illegible] out to the servants, "This is unusua[illegible] Bring up from the vaults of heaven [illegible] old wine. Fill all the tankards. I [illegible] the white-robed guests drink to the i[illegible] tal health of those new-born son[illegible] daughters of the Lord Almighty." "[illegible] is joy in heaven among the angels of [illegible] over one sinner that repenteth;" an[illegible] grant that that one may be you!

Again, to have a right heart it mus[illegible] forgiving hear[illegible] An old writer says [illegible] return good for evil is God-like; go[illegible] good is man-like; evil for good [illegible] like." Which of these natures hav[illegible] Christ will have nothing to do with [illegible] long as we keep any old grudge. W[illegible] all been cheated and lied about. Th[illegible] people who dislike us so much that [illegible] should come down to poverty and dis[illegible] they would say, "Good for him! [illegible] I tell you so?" They do not unde[illegible] us. Unsanctified human nature says, [illegible] till you get a good crack at him, and [illegible] at last you find him in a tight place, [illegible] to him. Flay him alive. No quarter. [illegible] not a rag of reputation. Jump on hi[illegible] both feet. Pay him in his own coi[illegible] casm for sarcasm, scorn for scorn, [illegible] for abuse." But, my friends, that [illegible] the right kind of heart. No man e[illegible] so mean a thing toward us as we [illegible] done toward God. And if we cann[illegible] give others, how can we expect G[illegible] forgive us? Thousands of men hav[illegible] kept out of heaven by an unforgiving [illegible]

Here is some one who says, "I w[illegible] give that man the wrong he did me [illegible] that house and lot; I will forgive th[illegible] who overreached me in a bargain [illegible] forgive that man who sold me a [illegible] overcoat; I forgive them—all bu[illegible] That man I cannot forgive. The vi[illegible] I can hardly keep my hands off hi[illegible] my going to heaven depends on [illegible] giving him, then I will stay out." [illegible] feeling! If a man lie to me once, I [illegible] called to trust him again. If a man [illegible] me once, I am not called to put con[illegible] in him again. But I would have n[illegible] I could not offer a sincere prayer [illegible] temporal and everlasting welfare of a [illegible] whatever meannesses and outrag[illegible] have inflicted upon me. If you w[illegible] get your heart right, strike a mat[illegible] burn up all your old grudges, and b[illegible] ashes away. "If you forgive not me[illegible] trespasses, neither will your heave[illegible] ther forgive you your trespasses."

An old Christian black woman [illegible] ing along the streets of New York [illegible] basket of apples that she had for s[illegible] rough sailor ran against her and u[illegible] basket, and stood back expecting [illegible] hear her scold frightfully, but she [illegible] down and picked up the apples, a[illegible] "God forgive you, my son, as I do. [illegible] sailor saw the meanness of what [illegible] done, and felt in his pocket for his [illegible] and insisted that she should take [illegible] Though she was black, he called he[illegible] er, and said, "Forgive me, mother [illegible] never do anything so mean again.' An[illegible] there is a power in a forgiving s[illegible] overcome all hardness. There is [illegible] of conquering men like that of be[illegible] upon them your pardon, whether t[illegible] accept it or not.

Again, a right heart is an expectan[illegible] It is a poor business to be building [illegible] in the air. pinnacles in the sky. We heard the click of the hoofs of the white horses on which the riders rode, and the clapping of the cymbals of eternal triumph. And while in our sleep we were glad that all our sorrows were over, and burdens done with, the night of God grew whiter and whiter and whiter, till we opened our eyes and saw that it was only the sun of earthly morning flashing on our pillow. To have a right belief, you need to be filled with this expectancy. It would make your privations and annoyances more bearable.

In the midst of the city of Paris stands a statue of the good but broken-hearted Josephine. I never imagined that marble could be smitten into such tenderness. It does not lifeless. If the spirit of Josephine be disentabernacled, the soul of the sculptress has taken possession of this figure. I am not yet satisfied that it is stone. The fold of the dress on the arm seems to need but the pressure of the finger to indent it. The figures at the bottom of the robe, the fur at the neck, the fur lining on the dress, the embroidery of the satin, the cluster of diamond leaf and rose in her hand, the poise of her body as she seems to come sailing out of the sky, her face calm, noble, beautiful, but yet sad—all the genius of the sculptor and the beauty of the heroine immortalized. Looking up through the folds of the coronet that encircled her brow, I could see the sky beyond, the great heavens where the woman's wrongs shall be righted, and the story of endurance and resignation shall be told to the ages. The rose and the lily in the hand of Josephine will never drop their petals. Believe not the recent flowers upon her memory. The children of God, whether they suffer on earth in palaces or in hovels, shall come to the glorious rest. Oh, heaven, sweet heaven! at thy gate we set down all our burdens and griefs. The place will be full. Here there are vacant chairs at the earth and at the table, but there are no vacant chairs in heaven. The crowns all worn; the thrones all mounted. Some talk of heaven as though it were a very handsome church, where a few favored spirits would come in and sit down on finely-cushioned seats all by themselves, and sing psalms to all eternity. No, no. "I saw a great multitude that no man could number standing before the throne. He that talked with me had a golden reed to measure the city, and it was twelve thousand furlongs"—that is, fifteen hundred miles — in circumference. Ah! heaven is not a little colony, at one corner of God's dominion, where a man's entrance depends upon what kind of clothes he has on his back, and how much money he has in his purse, but a vast empire.

And grant that the light of that blessed world may shine upon us in our last moment! The first time I crossed the Atlantic the roughest time we had was at the mouth of Liverpool harbor. We arrived at nightfall, and were obliged to lie there till the morning, waiting for the rising of the tide, before we could go up to the city. How the vessel pitched and writhed in the water! Sometimes, the last illness of the Christian is a struggle. He is almost through the voyage. The waves of temptation toss his soul, but he waits for the morning. At last the light dawns, and the tides of joy rise in his soul, and he sails up and casts anchor within the veil.

Is thy heart right? What question can compare with this in importance? It is a business question. Do you not realize that you will soon have to go out of that store, that you will soon have to resign that partnership, that soon among all the millions of dollars worth of goods that are sold, you will not have the handling of a yard of cloth, or a pound of sugar, or a penny-worth of anything; that soon, if a conflagration should start at Central Park and sweep everything to the Battery, it would not disturb you; that soon, if every cashier should abscond, and every insurance company should fail, it would not affect you?

What are the questions that stop this side the grave, compared with the questions that reach beyond it? Are you making losses that are to be everlasting? Are you making purchases for eternity? Are you jobbing for time when you might be wholesaling for eternity? What question of the store is so broad at the base, and so altitudinous, and so overwhelming as the question, "Is thy heart right?"

Or is it a domestic question? Is it something about father, or mother, or companion, or son, or daughter, that you think is comparable with this question in importance? Do you not realize that by universal and inexorable law all these relations will be broken up? Your father will be gone, your mother will be gone, your companion will be gone, your child will be gone, you will be gone, and then this supernal question will begin to harvest its chief gains, or deplore its worst losses, roll up into its mightiest magnitude, or sweep its vast circles. What difference now does it make to Napoleon III. whether he triumphed or surrendered at Sedan? whether he lived at the Tuileries or at Chislehurst, whether he was emperor or exile? They laid him out in his coffin in the dress of a field-marshal. Did that give him any better chance for the next world than if he had been laid out in a plain shroud? And soon to us what will be the difference, whether in this world we rode or walked, were bowed to or maltreated, were applauded or hissed at, were welcomed in or kicked out, while laying hold of every moment of the great future, and burning in all the splendor or grief, and overarching and undergoing all time and all eternity, is the plain, simple, practical, thrilling, agonizing, overwhelming question, "Is thy heart right?" Have you within you a repenting heart, an expectant heart? If not, I must write upon your soul what George Whitefield wrote upon the window-pane with his diamond ring. He tarried in an elegant house over-night, but found that there was no God recognized in that house.

Before he left his room in the morning, with his ring he wrote upon the window-pane, "One thing thou lackest." After the guest was gone, the housewife came and looked at the window, and saw the inscription, and called her husband and her children; and God, through that ministry of the window-glass, brought them all to Jesus. Though you may to-day be surrounded by comforts and luxuries, and feel that you have need of nothing, if you are not the children of God, with the signet-ring of Christ's love, let me inscribe upon your souls, "One thing thou lackest!"

King Khama's Happy Realm.

How the Converted Monarch Led the Once Savage Bamangwato to Christ, and the Land to Peace and Prosperity.

AFRICA'S most enlightened and Christian monarch, King Khama of the Bamangwato, a tribe south of the Zambesi, is now in England. Ten years ago, having been trained under missionary auspices, and previously enjoyed the friendship of Moffatt and Livingstone, he offered to hand over his country to the British Government under certain restrictions, one of which was the entire exclusion of intoxicating drinks. Though that offer was declined, the southern portion of his dominions was placed under a British protectorate. During his long reign, Khama, amid the most formidable opposition, has done his utmost to raise his subjects in the scale of civilization, and to build up "law, order and stability" in the country in which he holds sway. He has successfully combatted the superstitions and barbarous customs, witchcraft and the like, that prevailed among his people, encouraged industrial habits, promoted the creation of schools, and from the first has given effective protection to the missionaries who settled in his territory, and has done his utmost to avoid conflicts with his neighbors. He is essentially a man of peace. In reference to the military prowess of his people, he said:

I am reluctant to talk about war. I hate it. It is a thing of the past. I have never waged war, but only defended. I prefer not to talk about it, it brings back such sad thoughts. Peace reigns in my country, and I hope ever will—as a Christian I am opposed to war. I will not allow my people to follow up fugitives and take prisoners. If we are attacked we must fight: but it must be short, sharp, and then done with.

Khama is almost the only native chief who has successfully tried conclusions with the once formidable Matabele, who repeatedly made raids into his country, which he had to repel. On the last occasion this warlike tribe was repulsed with heavy loss, and the Bamangwato were never again molested.

Khama is not only a sincere Christian, but has made great sacrifices to raise his people in the scale of civilization. The success of the reforms he has introduced he rightly attributes to the rigid exclusion of strong drinks, and to the excellent moral influence of the Christian missionaries.

The object of his present visit to England is to seek an audience with the Queen, and a conference with the Secretary for the Colonies regarding the future of his own country, and especially to pray that it be not turned over to the Chartered Company or the Cape Colony authorities.

Khama's age is fifty-five. His father, whose name was Sekhome, was a man of very singular intelligence and energy and a chief of importance, but he remained a heathen to the end of his life. His mother was a constant attendant upon Christian worship in the church at Shoshong, the capital of the Bamangwato; and it was largely due to her influence that her sons became converts to Christianity. Three sons, Khama, Khamane, and Seretse, being converted, their father sought to kill them, but they were so beloved by the people that no one could be found to injure them. His rage was further heightened by Khama refusing to take more than one wife, stating as his reason that the Word of God forbade it. At last, to escape from their father's fury, Khama and his two Christian brothers fled to the mountains, where they remained for six weeks, until his anger had somewhat abated.

Khama was proclaimed chief of the Bamangwato in 1872. One brother contested his right to the chieftainship, and there were many stirring incidents in the early years of his reign. As soon as he was formally established he entered upon a series of reforms which he has continued to the present day. While desiring his people to accept Christianity, he would have no one forced to accept it, neither would he pay any respect to the old heathen customs of the country. In 1876 a dreadful famine came over the land, and, by the advice of the missionaries, Khama and the other Christians prayed earnestly for rain. A neighboring chief sent Khama a taunting message: "You are a wise man! Go on praying; that's the proper thing to do. You are the man of wisdom." This was hard for him to bear, but he and his friends kept on praying for a week, and then rain came down in torrents.

One of his earliest acts was the freeing of the slaves and the nomad subject tribes, to all of whom he gave seed-corn and cattle, and encouraged them in pastoral pursuits. In the course of time he abolished polygamy and the practices of witchcraft, and introduced trial by jury. Within the last few years he has moved his capital from Shoshong to Palapye, where there is an abundant supply of water, and where more sanitary conditions of life can be enforced. Palapye is now the largest native town in South Africa, as well as incomparably the most wholesome and comfortable.

No one who has seen the terrible results of free trade in liquor among the Hottentots and Kaffirs of the Cape Colony, can blame Khama for the unceasing hostility he has shown to drink and the drink traffic. He has had a hard battle—far harder than most people can imagine. So far he has won, and the banishment of strong drink from his country has undoubtedly resulted in the saving of many thousands of pounds and of incalculable health and comfort to his tribesmen. Mr. Cecil Rhodes' Chartered South African Company is suspected of being willing to flood the Protectorate and Khama's country with Cape brandy, and for this reason Khama has come to England to beseech the British Government to continue their Protectorate over his country, and not to place it under the government of the Chartered Government.

PORTRAIT OF KING KHAMA—A BAMANGWATO FAMILY.

APPALLED AT HIS HANDIWORK.

A striking anecdote illustrative of the work of conscience, was related by a temperance leader recently. A young man entered the bar-room of a village tavern and called for a drink. "No," the landlord; "you have had too much already. You have been raving mad once, and I can not sell you any more." He stepped aside to make room for a couple of young men who had just entered, and the landlord waited upon them very politely. The other stood by sullenly, and when they had finished he walked up to the landlord and said, "Six years ago, at their age, I stood where those young men are now. I was a man with fair prospects. Now, at the age of twenty-eight, I am a wreck, body and mind. You led me to drink. In this room I formed the habit that has been my ruin. Now sell me a few more glasses, and your work will be done! I will be done! I will be soon out of the way; there is no hope for me. But they can be saved: they may be men again. Do not sell it to them. Sell it to me and let me die, and the world will be rid of me: but for heaven's sake don't sell any more to them." The landlord listened, pale and trembling. Setting down his decanter, he exclaimed: "God helping me, that is the last drop I will ever sell to any one!" He kept his word.

RUTH'S CHOICE.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 20. Ruth. 1: 14-22. Golden Text, Ruth 1: 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THERE are moments in the lives of all of us which are moments of crisis. A decision has to be made: everything is at stake which affects our usefulness and our happiness. But far more important than these personal considerations, everything is at stake which relates to God's glory and to his purpose in us. It is at such a moment that we consciously choose or refuse Christ, and God's salvation in him. Such a moment may come in the offer or in the accepting or refusing an offer of marriage. There may be such a moment of decision in the entering upon a business, in the undertaking of some work for God, or in the definite acceptance or refusal of a call of God to missionary work. These moments of choice and of decision tell for time and for eternity.

Such was the choice of Ruth the young Moabitish widow, who had married into the Jewish family of Elimelech, who, in the time of famine, went to sojourn in the country of Moab, for the sake of the better chance such a step seemed to offer for the maintenance of himself and family.

A severe rebuke came upon the family. Elimelech thought his life would be safer because of his precaution in leaving the famine-stricken land of Canaan, and that in this he was doing better for his family which consisted of his wife and two sons. But the life which he had thought to conserve better than God could do it was required of him, and the sons for whose sake also he had fled before the famine, both Died in the Land of Plenty!

All he got by his sojourn in Moab was a family alliance which must have been displeasing to God, who had commended that a Moabite "should not enter into the congregation of the Lord." (Deut. 23: 3). And now Elimelech and his two sons were dead, and their widows were left to tell the story of how miserable was the failure of God's people in trouble who thought they could do better for themselves than God could do for them.

A report had reached them from the land of promise which they had abandoned for the place where God was unknown: they heard that while they were mourning the fruits of their unbelief, gladness and prosperity had visited the people who remained behind in the Lord's land. He "had visited his people in giving them bread." Naomi, the elder widow, began to awake to the situation. When she was in the old land, the smile of God was upon her, and in her old age she arose, and determined to retrace her steps, and be found again among the people of the Lord. Blessed backslider, who comes to the same decision and acts upon it.

But what about the two young widows? In the East, the married sons live with their parents, and the family grows to be a tribe. Therefore the widows remain in the house into which they have married. But in the case of Orpah and Ruth, to follow Naomi to Canaan would involve leaving all which was dear to them; relatives, friends, religion, habits of life, all would have to be [illegible]: what would they get in exchange? Such would be the question which would occur most naturally to these young women. And this settled the question for Orpah. Naomi saw it was too much to ask of them to make so great a sacrifice as would be involved in following her, and she therefore encouraged them to return to their own [illegible]: "Go, return each of you to her mother's house. The Lord deal kindly with you as ye have dealt with the dead and with me;" and after a little hesitation, Orpah returned.

Something New had Entered into the life of Ruth. She had heard of the living God, and her whole soul was penetrated with what she heard of the God of Israel. It was the tidings of his faithfulness to his people which had influenced Naomi to return to her land. If he was the true and only God, then he had a right to the trust and the obedience of all the creatures which he had made. The question with Ruth was not what she should gain personally by the change, but what was due to this one and only true God. Just as long as an important decision hangs upon the gain or loss it is to us personally, just as long as self-love must be the umpire, the decision is evaded, recalled, never thoroughly final. "I want to serve God, but I don't want to be peculiar." "I must have some relaxation." "I want the joy of serving him, but I don't want to be despised, to be misunderstood, or to be looked down upon." "I want to preserve my reputation." "I must have credit for all that I do for him: if I get this I can forego the world." Such are human considerations.

Miserable self-pleasing! This is not to serve God. If the service of God is not worth the loss of all, it is worth nothing. If we do not count the honor of being despised for his sake, who was despised for ours, worth more than our miserable and most undeserved reputation, then we prove ourselves unworthy of him. Ruth took in that the God of Israel was God indeed, and worthy of all, and more than all, that she could give. And so she answered Naomi by an act of consecration which has been a model for all time. "Entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee; for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also if aught but death part thee and me."

Ruth's choice was not grounded on the consideration of what she should get, but on that of What was Due to God.

Should any undecided soul read this page who thinks because he has seen so many miserable, unhappy, mean Christians, that, after all, it will answer his purpose best in this world, at least, to throw over religion altogether, and to "enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season," (Heb. 11: 25), and he will take the risk of the awful hereafter. Let me ask such an one a question: "Are you prepared to say there is no God? If not, then are you treating him as you would expect to be treated by a creature who was dependent upon you for every breath he draws: for sight, learning, reason, etc., and to whom you had offered, at a stupendous cost, a free pardon for numberless transgressions?" Look far away from the many hard specimens of Christians, and let God make you a man after his own heart, and you will praise him forever.

Young sister, are you now deliberating about an alliance with an ungodly man; whose position in the world, and whose admiration of you pleases and gratifies your pride? Are you weighing what you would gain in accepting him, and what you would gain in rejecting him? Oh, put self out of [illegible]. You [illegible] to Another. What would your God gain or lose? What would please him? What would work for the honor of his kingdom, what would carry out his will? He is your Father; what should a child do to please such a Father at such a crisis? O choose with Ruth! Young man, are you a child of God, balancing in your mind a grave business question: there lies, perhaps, before you an opening, the income is large and it is certain, but it is a business which ruins souls and bodies; drink, tobacco, opium, or some form of ruinous self-indulgence. You think you could balance the evil by giving some of your ill-gotten gains to the work of God; you cannot afford to lose such an opening. And then on the other hand you are God's child, you cannot afford to lose your soul. O look away from the personal question; you belong to God, can you say you would enter upon this thing to hallow his name, to extend his kingdom, to do his will? If not, decide against it, or you can never again pray honestly the Lord's prayer, for you have deliverately chosen against God. Ruth's choice led her into the field of the Lord of the harvest, and Ruth became a gleaner.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"BUT RUTH CLAVE UNTO HER."

THE Book of Ruth, like the Book of Esther and Solomon's Song, is so distinctly a personal story that, at first sight, it seems out of place in a volume devoted to so high a theme as the revelation of God to mankind. We are surprised to see the history of nations, the code of divine legislation and the records of national judgments interrupted to tell the story of three women. But the simple tale teaches its own home lesson and is exceedingly beautiful. Jeremy Taylor used to say it was a rich gem, lying between the ermine of the Judges and the purple of the Kings. Its author and date are unknown. Jewish tradition ascribes it to Samuel, but there are internal evidences that if Samuel did write it, some other author must have revised it at a much later date. The events described in the book must, however, have happened in, or soon after, the time of Gideon. The fact that David was the great-grandson of Ruth helps to fix the period as about 1,200 years before Christ. Possibly the famine referred to in the first verse, may have been that caused by the depredations of the Midianites, before Gideon's heroic expulsion of them. In five verses the situation is briefly but pathetically sketched. Pressed by the scarcity of food in his own land, Elimelech, a man of the tribe of Judah, following the example of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, sought a land where there was food to be had. He had not far to go. Across the Jordan, some fifty miles away, lay the land of Moab, a region about forty miles long by twenty wide (less than half the size of Delaware), where there was no scarcity. It was occupied by an idolatrous tribe tracing its descent to Lot. Thither Elimelech went, taking with him his wife and their two sons. Elimelech died there, and his two son after marrying women of the country, died also. Ten years after leaving Israel, Naomi, widowed and childless, turns her face homeward. Her daughters-in-law decided to go with her, they, according to Oriental usage, being identified more closely with their husbands' family than with their own. But Naomi, knowing that as foreigners they might not receive a very cordial welcome in Israel and that in any case, they would be separated from their own friends with little prospect of making new connections, urged them to remain behind. It was sensible, prudent counsel, such as she felt bound to give, though it probably cost her a pang. There was evidently a strong affection between the women. Orpah, who finally returned to Moab, started to go to Israel with Naomi and desisted only at the earnest warning uttered by her mother-in-law on the [illegible]. Even then she yielded reluctantly and [illegible] tears. Ruth's love was still stro[illegible]. Naomi's warnings had no effect upon [illegible]. She was not seeking her own advan[illegible] but Naomi's good. To her came the w[illegible] and honor that she did not seek. Thu[illegible] story illustrates both of Christ's parac[illegible] (Luke 17: 33): "Whosoever shall se[illegible] save his life shall lose it and whos[illegible] shall lose his life shall preserve it." E[illegible] lech lost his life, though he sacrifice[illegible] religious privileges in seeking to sa[illegible]. Ruth, on the other hand, who, as the p[illegible] is, threw herself away, that is, gav[illegible] her prospects to devote herself to a li[illegible] toil, gained more than she renounce[illegible].

Thy sister-in-law has gone back. U[illegible] pily that has sometimes been said of [illegible] sons who have started to follow Chris[illegible] the reign of Queen Mary, a smith wa[illegible] rested for his faith. He saved himself [illegible] going to the stake by recanting. W[illegible] friend expostulated with him, he re[illegible] "The cause is good; but for my part [illegible] not burn for it." It was a strange c[illegible] dence that after all the smith perishe[illegible] fire. His house was burned and he f[illegible] to the flames while tryiug to save so [illegible] his property.

Entreat me not to leave thee. An [illegible] writer says that in a sudden erupt[illegible] Mount Etna the people in one of the t[illegible] ened villages spent the brief hours [illegible] them before the hot lava could reac[illegible] homes in gathering their valuables [illegible] packing them in shape convenient fo[illegible] rying away. The bulky things m[illegible] left behind and there was many a tea[illegible] treasured possessions which were too l[illegible] or too large to be carried. Two young [illegible] Anaphias and Amphonimus by nam[illegible] lected their poor property which w[illegible] they would have to start in life. But a [illegible] were setting out to join the sad proc[illegible] of homeless villagers, the thought of [illegible] aged parents came to mind. The [illegible] men went to their home and found tha[illegible] were sick and neither was able to [illegible] "Leave us; save yourselves and [illegible] goods," said the father. The youn[illegible] looked in each other's faces and each [illegible] down his bundle. Leaving all they [illegible] the world, one took his father and the [illegible] his mother on his back and so the [illegible] from the doomed village.

Whither thou goest I will go. [illegible] Ruth made this resolution, she had [illegible] warned that there was nothing to be [illegible] ed by going with Naomi. She love[illegible] mother-in-law so well that she was [illegible] be hindered by the hardships that mi[illegible] entailed by following her. It is s[illegible] spirit that Christ looks for in thos[illegible] would follow him. Mohammed had [illegible] a follower. When there were none w[illegible] lieved in him outside his own family [illegible] Bekr joined himself to him. He w[illegible] sole companion of Mohammed in his [illegible] and he declared that he was prepa[illegible] sacrifice even his father and mother [illegible] friend. George Fox, the founder [illegible] Society of Friends found such a fri[illegible] Margaret Fell, who afterward becan[illegible] wife. DR. TALMAGE'S NEW FIELD.

His Call to Washington—The Historic First Presbyterian Church—Its Pastor and his Patriotic Work of Nearly Half a Century.

THE news has already been widely telegraphed through the United States and cabled across the Atlantic that Dr. Talmage, the world-famous preacher, and editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has decided to settle in the National Capital. An enthusiastic and unanimous invitation was sent to him a few weeks ago, from the First Presbyterian Church of Washington, D. C., to become its pastor in conjunction with Dr. Byron Sunderland, who has ministered to it for the long period of forty-two years. Recognizing the wide field of usefulness such a position would open to him, Dr. Talmage has accepted the call, and will commence his ministry at the end of this month. The installation services will be held Oct. 23 or 30. Nothing could have been more cordial than the invitation both from pastor and people. Dr. Sunderland has been a warm friend of Dr. Talmage for many years and is delighted to secure him as a colleague. Dr. Talmage fully reciprocates the feeling and is anticipating with a great deal of pleasure the prospect of more intimate association with his old friend. He has also the assurance of the most hearty and enthusiastic welcome from the church. The call was endorsed by every member and Dr. Sunderland voiced the popular feeling when he wrote: "This entire town will rejoice when the papers announce your acceptance of our call. Not only our church has called you but, so far as I can judge, the whole capital."

DR. BYRON SUNDERLAND,
Associated with Dr. Talmage in the Pastorate.

It is an historic church to which Dr. Talmage is going. It was organized nearly a hundred years ago. Its first home was a carpenter's shop which then stood in the grounds of the White House. After a time, a private building was hired for its services and still later, as the numbers grew, the church was permitted to use the Supreme Court room in the basement of the Capitol. In 1812, the first church edifice was erected. It stood to the south of the Capitol and was known as "The little White Chapel on the Hill." Fifteen years later, the congregation had so far outgrown its accommodations that a new building was indispensable. A site was purchased on Four and a half street, which at that time was in the centre of the best residential quarter of the city, and a large church was erected. It served until 1860, when it was enlarged; and further improvements were made in 1891. It is known as "the President's Church," from the fact that President Cleveland is one of its pew-holders. Three other Presidents—Jackson, Polk, and Pierce—made it their church home, and President Buchanan and Grant were also, during their terms, occasionally seen among the worshippers there. Other famous men in political, diplomatic, and legal circles have also been communicants, pew-holders, or frequent visitors to the First Church. Among them we find the names of Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Senator Benton, and William H. Seward.

Dr. Byron Sunderland, whose portrait appears on this page, became its pastor in 1871. In the troubles that soon afterward broke upon the nation he took a decided stand, which identified the church uncompromisingly with the North. He preached to the Union regiments as they passed through the Capital, and scandalized southern sentiment by inviting Frederick Douglass to hold a meeting in his church. The notoriety brought upon him led to his election in 1863 as Chaplain of the Senate. Of late Dr. Sunderland has felt the weight of advancing years, and has intimated a wish to retire from the pastorate. The church, however, would not entertain the idea of losing their beloved pastor, and hailed with joy the arrangement now completed by which Dr. Talmage will be associated with him.

The proprietor of this journal is glad to be able to assure its readers that Dr. Talmage's change of residence will involve no change in his relations with them. He will continue to be the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will not diminish his editorial labors. No public teacher more fully appreciates the value of the press as an agency for promoting the moral and religious advance of the people; and he is aware that the largest audience he could reach with his voice is small compared with the number he can reach through the columns of this journal. To one, therefore, whom countless multitudes in his own and other lands have made their religious teacher, who knows that thousands who go to no church, or who are kept away from church by sickness or other causes, are looking to him for spiritual food, the pulpit from which alone the words of life can reach them, is most precious—the one that must ever have his best efforts.

THE FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Wherever he may go, however distinguished may be the audience he speaks to, he knows that his most effective ministry must be in the journal that is read not only in our great cities, but in the lonely log cabin, on the Western ranch, in the miner's hut, in isolated farm-houses far away from any church, under the broiling sun of Equatorial Africa, amid the snow and ice of Arctic regions,—everywhere in the world where there are men struggling to live better lives. To be able to give encouragement, guidance and sympathy to such people is a privilege few religious teachers possess and none could appreciate it more than does Dr. Talmage. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the vehicle of this world-wide ministration and in these days when telephone and telegraph have annihilated distance, he can use it as effectively in Washington as he did when he lived in Brooklyn. By editorial and by sermon he will continue week by week to address the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Subscribers and correspondents writing Dr. Talmage on matters relating to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should address their letters to him at the Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

stay in that country became fully informed as to the condition of affairs in the different villages and districts which had been ravaged by the Kurds, and their population despoiled of home, food, cattle and horses, implements and everything that made life desirable. Since his return, the condition of these people has become much worse, and the approach of winter threatens the extermination of whole villages of destitute, unless help is afforded.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commends the cause of the suffering and persecuted brethren in Armenia to its readers, confident that the same zeal in well-doing that has prompted them to high Christian enterprises in the past, will lead them to extend a helpful hand to these needy ones across the sea who are now in such dire distress. Humanity alone would prompt us to send them what aid we can give: Christianity makes it a high privilege and a sacred duty. In the present case, the claim upon our sympathies are two-fold, for not only are the Armenians our fellow-beings, but they are the oldest Christian nation on the globe and a nation, moreover, whose martyr-roll is continually being swelled by fresh sacrifices for Christ and the faith. "No," say the peasant men and women, to the oppressor, "I cannot deny my Christ and embrace Islam, even to save my life;" and they welcome the Kurdish swords and spears rather than abandon the faith they have inherited from their fathers. They are a very simple, peaceful, pastoral people, and in the past centuries they have been subjected to persecutions and oppressions without number. Driven from their homes, robbed of their little possessions, insulted, outraged, disgraced, treated as worse than outcasts and beggars; flung into jails and dungeons, subjected to the torture, they have never once wavered in their allegiance to the Master by deserting and forswearing whom they could have gained worldly honors and wealth. They only knew one ultimate duty when all the world seemed to oppose and forsake them—they knew how to cling to Christ and their simple faith. And knowing this, they knew how to die, with them to live was Christ and to die was gain. (Phil. 1: 21.)

The eyes of the civilized world are, with one accord, turned toward ancient Eden. Now, more than at any time in the past, it is the scene of mourning and desolation. A land of peace and plenty, capable of maintaining a great population, has by man's wickedness, been once more turned into a land of want and sorrow. The Kurd and the Moslem have there wrought such misery as the rest of the world can but faintly comprehend. Stated plainly, the case of the persecuted Armenians is sufficiently desperate to arouse to instant action all the forces of Christendom. The Evangelical Alliance, at its meeting in Boston last week, adopted resolutions calling upon the national government to co-operate with the governments of Europe in preventing further persecutions of Armenians, and invoking the intercession of the Christian powers for that purpose.

In the meantime, practical sympathy must take the form of relief, to be extended to the sufferers, sufficient for their urgent needs. We cannot be regardless of the cry that comes to us for food, clothing, fuel and shelter. In helping an Armenian now, we may be helping a martyr, for nearly all stand on the brink of martyrdom, unless the Powers interpose. Mr. Howard, our Commissioner, assures us that five dollars will support a mother and two children for a whole year. But every contribution, no matter how small, will be welcome, since many small gifts in the aggregate, under God's blessing, accomplish much good. All contributions to the Armenian Relief Fund should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be acknowledged in these columns. TRANSFORMED RAGS.

The change from death to life is not greater than was the spiritual change from Saul the persecutor to Paul the Apostle. Gotthold draws a parallel from the manufacture of paper. He says that there is nothing much dirtier or more repulsive than the bags of rags that are carted to a paper mill. Foul and filthy and noxious they come out of ash-barrels or out of gutters, and have been gathered by dirty Italian ragpickers. But wait till the manufacturer has brought his machinery and his staff of workers to bear upon them. What is that beautiful white paper, thick and smooth, on which delicate hands can write? It is the product of the filthy rags that were taken to the mill. The paper is not a new creation but a transformation. It is out of material a vile as the rags that the glorified spirits around the throne have come.

IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW.

DEAR heart, remember still and trust,
There is no dark Gethsemane.
Where thou must weep and watch alone,
The Lord himself will go with thee.

In wildest storm he'll shelter thee,
In deepest anguish of the soul,
The precious hand will touch and heal,
And make the wounded spirit whole.

The angel of his presence still,
Shall surely go and light the way,
Through Valley of the Shadow dark,
Leading to heaven's immortal day.

A gentle leaning on the arm,
Of tenderest love around thee thrown,
A trustful leaving all with God,
And his sweet peace shall be thine own.

Dear heart, still take no anxious thought
For what the unseen day may hold,
God knows it all, he watches still,
And lovingly his plans unfold.

TIRED WOMEN.

THERE is the trial of non-appreciation. That is what made Martha so mad with Mary. As now, men bothered with the anxieties of the store, and office, and shop, or coming from the stock-exchange, they say when they get home: "Oh, you ought to be in our factory a little while; you ought to have to manage eight, or ten, or twenty subordinates, and then you would know what trouble and anxiety are!" Oh, sir! the wife and mother has to conduct at the same time a university, a clothing establishment, a restaurant, a laundry, a library, while she is health officer, police, and president of her realm. She must do a thousand things, and do them well, in order to keep things going smoothly; and so her brain and her nerves are taxed to the utmost. I know there are housekeepers who are so fortunate that they can sit in an armchair in the library, or lie on the belated pillow, and throw off all the care upon subordinates, who, having large wages and great experience, can attend to all of the affairs of the household. Those are the exceptions. I am writing this morning of the great mass of housekeepers—the women to whom life is a struggle, and who at thirty years of age look as though they were forty, and at forty look as though they were fifty, and at fifty look as though they were sixty. The fallen at Chalons, and Austerlitz, and Gettysburg, and Waterloo are a small number compared with the slain in the great Armageddon of the kitchen. You go out to the cemetery and you will see that the tombstones all read beautifully poetic; but if those tombstones would speak the truth, thousands of them would say: "Here lies a woman killed by too much mending, and sewing, and baking, and scrubbing, and scouring; the weapon with which she was slain was a broom, or a sewing-machine, or a ladle." You think, O, man of the world, that you have all the cares and anxieties.

If the cares and anxieties of the household should come upon you for one week you would be a fit candidate for Bloomingdale—I mean insane asylum. The half-rested housekeeper arises in the morning. She must have the morning repast prepared at an irrevocable hour. What if the fire will not light? what if the marketing did not come? what if the clock has stopped? No matter; she must have the morning repast at an irrevocable hour. Then the children must be got off to school. What if their garments are torn? What if they do not learn their lessons? What if they have lost a hat or sash? They must be ready. Then you have all the diet of the day, and perhaps of several days, to plan. But what if the butcher has sent meat unmasticable, or the grocer has sent articles of food adulterated? and what if some piece of silver be gone, or some favorite chalice be cracked, or the roof leak, or the plumbing fail, or any one of a thousand things occur? You must be ready. Spring weather comes and there must be a revolution in the family wardrobe; or autumn comes, and you must shut out the northern blast. But what if the moth has preceded you to the chest? what if, during the year, the children have outgrown the apparel of last year? what if the fashions have changed? Your house must be an apothecary's shop; it must be a dispensary; there must be medicines for all sorts of ailments—something to loosen the croup, something to cool the burn, something to poultice the inflammation, something to silence the jumping tooth, something to soothe the earache. You must be in half a dozen places at the same time, or you must attempt to be. If, under all this wear and tear of life, your "better half" makes an impatient rush upon the library or drawing-room, be patient, be lenient. O woman, though I may fail to stir up an appreciation in the souls of others in regard to your household toils, let me assure you, from the kindliness with which Jesus Christ met Martha, that he appreciates all your work from garret to cellar; and that the God of Deborah, and Hannah, and Abigail, and Grandmother Lois, and Elizabeth Fry, and Hannah More, is the God of the housekeeper. Jesus was never married, that he might be the especial friend and confidant of a whole world of troubled womanhood.

THE WEARY PEN.

THERE are many new kinds of pen being manufactured, but no man has yet been able to invent a pen that will not get weary. We have often had hold of a pen that seemed determined to skip and gambol. It leaped from paragraph to paragraph. It flew from simile to trope. It made a dash as it went. It slurred unimportant events. It threw interjections of surprise, and interrogations of inquiry, and hour after hour rushed along the line. But after a while it was sure to get weary. It stumbled. It dragged. It blotted. It staggered. And after a while it dropped as though dead. Talk of weary legs and arms; let some one tell us the story of weary pens. They may be found late at night in editorial rooms, and on reportorial desks, and in the hand of poet, essayist, romancist and historian. For the most part they hunger for more bread, and yawn for more sleep, and worn out, long for the grave of obliteration. Kept in a fine case at Abbotsford, you may find the expired pen of Walter Scott, and in the venerable hall of Philadelphia the pen which signed the Declaration of Independence. But "post-mortem" honors are seldom awarded to deceased quills. They are generally thrown away. They drop into the dust and are trod on, and the places that knew them once know them no more. But our chief sympathy is for the living pens, which write and write, and wish they could die. Nothing in all the world has such hard work making a livelihood as pen and pencil. The one languishes in the picture gallery, the other faints in the study. May the day speed on when literature and art shall come to higher appreciation. That will be the Elysium of pen and pencil.

MISREPRESENTATION.

SOME years ago I wrote an article denouncing the exclusiveness of churches, and making a plea for the working classes. In the midst of that article there were two ironical sentences, in which I expressed the disgust which some people have for anybody that works for a living. Some enemy took those two ironical sentences and sent them all around the world as my sentiments of disgust with the working classes, and a popular magazine of the country, taking those two ironical sentences as a text, went on to say that I preached every Sunday with kid gloves and a swallowtail coat (!), and that I ought to remember that if I ever got to heaven I should have to be associated with the working classes, and be with the fishermen apostles, and Paul the tent-maker. To this very day, I get letters from all parts of the earth containing little newspaper scraps, saying, "Did you really say that? How is it possible you can so hate the working classes? How can you make that accord with the words of sympathy you have recently been uttering in behalf of their sorrows?" Years ago I preached a series of sermons on good and bad amusements. There appeared in print a sermon as mine, denouncing all amusements, representing that all actors, play-actors, and actresses were dissolute without any exception, and that all theatrical places were indecent, and that every man who went to a theatre lost his soul, and that it was wrong even to go to a zoological garden, and a sin to look at a zebra. I never preached one word of the sermon. Every word of that sermon was written in a printing office, by a man who had never seen me,—every word of it except the text, and that he got by sending to another printing office.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

—, Clifton, Mass. What is the meaning of the foundations of Jericho being laid in children? (1. Kings 16: 34.)

Simply that on the days referred to, Hiel, who undertook the rebuilding of the city, buried his eldest and youngest sons. That was in accord with the curse Joshua pronounced on any one who should restore the city. (See Joshua 6: 26.) He was to lose both his sons.

Mrs. Ada Adams, Elsie, Neb., writes:

I have a Sunday School class of twelve boys and girls, from twelve to sixteen years old, and should like the pleasure of placing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in their hands to read. We are homesteaders in the drouth-stricken part of Nebraska, and unable to buy our literature. This is the third year our crops have failed.

Possibly some reader having back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or other religious literature may wish to aid this class in a distant State.

Chas. Fidler, Fredericktown, O. Christ's command to preach the Gospel to every creature did not appear to be limited to the Apostles; is it limited in these days to regularly ordained ministers?

There are many lay preachers whose success is a proof that God approves of their work. There are, too, other ways of preaching the Gospel besides that of standing in a pulpit and addressing a congregation. Every Christian who tells his friend of its blessedness and how much it has done for him is preaching the Gospel. In Sunday School and in the home there are frequent opportunities for obeying Christ's commands.

C. Leifchild, Chicago. I have heard the Revised Version denounced as the work of Unitarians and scholars who did not reverence the Word of God. Do you think it ought to be used?

If you wish for the truth, and accuracy of translation, you should use the Revised Version. The utmost care was taken in preparing it, to get the exact meaning of every passage. There were Episcopalians, Baptists and other evangelical denominations represented on the committee that prepared the Revision. They had the help of much older manuscripts than were accessible when the Authorized Version was prepared. There is no question about the Revision being a more accurate translation and therefore all who love the truth more than old association would do well to use it.

Here is a pleasant reminder of the summer work at Mont-Lawn—a letter from the parents of two little ones who were among our summer guests:

With grateful hearts to God, it is our pleasure to send our thanks for your love and kindness in giving to our children this summer the benefit and enjoyment of staying at your Children's Home for ten days. May God bless you for it. It is a grand and noble work that God has chosen you for. It is a wonderful blessing for little children who have to stay in the city the whole year round to get such a blessed treat as they did up there. It is refreshing both for soul and body, and I thank God for his marvelous goodness in letting his love constrain man to open such a place as the Children's Home in Nyack. May the harvest bring forth much fruit of the seed sown there. Yours,

STEPHEN and HILLEBORG TALGR.

A. Sharett, Bruceville, Md. I am much concerned about a sermon preached by Dr. Talmage on the sin against the Holy Ghost. He said that the Bible declared it should never be forgiven. What is sinning against the Holy Ghost?

The context of the passage indicates the nature of the sin. (Mark 3: 22-30). The scribes said that the power by which Christ worked his miracles came from Satan. The charge roused his indignation and caused him to utter the words which Dr. Talmage quoted. If the sin can be committed in these days (which many doubt), it consists in ridiculing the work of the Holy Spirit in conversion. When a man is converted, or when there is a revival re-ligion and men ascribe the work to the vil- or scoff at it, they come perilously near t sin which Jesus denounced.

For the re r part, the island, which appeared to e out twenty miles long, was composed f t-topped sand hills. On ascending one of these, an indentation 150 feet deep was found at its summit, like the crater of a volcano. A descent was made, and the party were in the midst of what had apparently been a burying ground. Scattered around were fragments of mortars and pestles, evidently broken intentionally, highly colored abalone shells, rings of stone, fish-hooks, and other articles. The wind had tossed away the sand in one place, leaving exposed what appeared to be a human head. A little digging around it revealed a perfect skeleton. It was in a kneeling posture, the hands clasped behind the head. Buried with it were three flutes, broken like everything else. The flutes were made out of the leg-bones of deer, and were highly ornamented. It is supposed that the skeleton was that of the musician of his tribe. Many other graves were found, but the bones in them were separated and scattered. With them was always a stone axe, a quantity of beads or some other emblem of the dead person's occupation. Evidently the island in some remote period had been the home of a tribe of Indians. Their bones indicate that they were of great stature and physical strength. They have passed away, leaving no trace of their existence but their bones and the few poor implements that they used. Modern races, though inferior to them in physical power, could not be so completely wiped out. They leave works that would tell of their presence after the lapse of a longer period. The product of mental power is more enduring than that of physical power. But even that will eventually vanish, and only the spiritual will last into eternity.

THE ALPINE DISASTERS—CARRYING THE GUIDE'S DEAD BODY HOME.

A House Owner's Rights Disputed.

An interesting lawsuit has been commenced in Justice Barrett's Court in New York. The point in dispute is whether the owner of a house in Ninety-first street has the right to erect a high fence in her back-yard. The owners of the houses forming the four sides of the block are all wealthy, and they have taken a pride in making their back-yards beautiful with plants and shrubs. The fences are all low and the inner space surrounded by the houses, as seen from the back windows, looks like one beautiful garden. Recently one of the houses was bought by a banker, who went to live in it. He has built a three-story extension at the back of his house, thus replacing his contribution to the general view with an unsightly building. Its windows, too, overlook the back yards of his neighbors on each side. Some of his neighbors remonstrated with him, but he contended that as the land was his own, he could do as he chose with it. His next door neighbor, thereupon, determined to retaliate, and commenced the erection of a fence twenty-five feet high which would completely shut out the view from the banker's extension on that side. He objected to this and appealed to the courts. He obtained a temporary injunction restraing her from erecting the fence, and the court has now to decide whether the injunction shall be made permanent, as the banker asks. It is difficult to see the consistency of his argument. As it is based on the theory that a man may do what he pleases with his own, he cannot consistently deny the right of his neighbor to erect the fence on her own land. It will be for the court to decide the dispute according to the principles of law. Under the principles of the Gospel it would not have arisen. He who lives under those principles does not insist on his rights to the detriment of others, nor retaliate when injured. His Master's rule is his law:

[Therefore whatsoever ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so to them (Matt. 7: 12).

Solved in a Dream.

A psychological journal reports a strange incident of dream life on the testimony of a witness whose veracity, it says, is unimpeachable. A friend who knew his fondness for difficult arithmetical problems submitted one to him that gave him some trouble. He tried several ways of solving it, but could not succeed. One night he tried the problem again just before retiring to rest, with the usual result. He went to sleep thinking of it and it disturbed his dreams. He dreamed that while he was working over the problem, a venerable man entered the room. Looking closely at him, he recognized him as his old schoolmaster. The old man had long been dead but in dreams inconsistencies of that kind are of no consequence. The dreamer hailed his visit with pleasure and submitted the problem to him just as he used to do when he was a boy in his school. He dreamed that the old man took the problem in hand, solved it easily and showed him how it was done. In the morning, as a matter of curiosity, he worked out the problem in the way he saw his teacher work it in his dream. To his astonishment it proved a correct and simple way of solving it. Every one understands that the solution to the problem was worked out by the dreamer's own brain. It is an interesting question for psychologists how it was that the brain could do it when he was asleep, though it could not when he was awake. Sometimes the problems of providence, and spiritual difficulties have found their solution in a similar involuntary way, but when a man lives in close communion with God there is no need to go to psychology for an explanation of the phenomenon.

BRIEF NOTES.

All Letters to Dr. Talmage as Editor of The CHRISTIAN HERALD, should be addressed to him at The Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

In the new British House of Commons there are 31 Methodists, 34 Presbyterians, 23 Congregationalists, 3 Baptists, 6 Quakers, 11 Unitarians, 7 Jews, making together 118 members who do not belong to the Established Church.

Successful Revival Services have been held in Nebraska by Evangelist C. S. Billings. At Farnham, though the farmers were pressed with work they came in considerable numbers, and there were some remarkable conversions.

Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman has Arranged to hold a series of Gospel services in the Twenty-sixth ward of Brooklyn beginning Oct. 23. The churches uniting in the movement are the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist and Reformed. It is proposed to hold the services alternately in the Williams avenue and Andrews M. E. Churches and if necessary to hold them simultaneously. Meetings will be held each afternoon and evening.

Practical Help of a Most Valuable Kind is being rendered in Philadelphia and Boston to young men in positions where the salary is small. The Chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in those cities have established boarding houses of an economical kind where the rates are fixed at the lowest rate at which board can be furnished. The houses are neither for charity nor for profit. They are unsectarian.

The American Board has Received an Encouraging report from its Zulu Mission. During the past ten years, since the jubilee held in 1885, its gains are as follows: 1 mission station, 12 out-stations, 1 physician, 4 female assistant missionaries, 20 native teachers, 117 other native helpers, 5 churches, 1,024 church members, (47 additions on confession of faith), 24 pupils in boys' school, a girls' boarding-school, 182 pupils in the girls' schools, 10 common schools, and 507 pupils in common schools.

The Twelfth Annual Convention of the Christian Alliance is being held this week in the Gospel Tabernacle, New York. The sessions commence each day at nine o'clock and continue with brief intervals all day. A large number of members of the Alliance from other cities have come to New York to take part in the Convention. The closing meeting will be held on Sunday, October 13, in the American Theatre, the Tabernacle not being large enough to accommodate the numbers expected.

The Treasurers of the Presbyterian Boards have already received sixty thousand dollars for liquidation of their respective debts from the Anniversary Reunion Fund which was opened for that purpose. The indebtedness to be removed is as follows: Home Missions, $220,348; Women's Home Missions Committee, $22,622; Foreign Missions, $174,177; Freedmen, $22,852; Education, $3,539; Ministerial Relief, $1,977. The amount so far received comes from about one thousand churches, leaving over six thousand still to be heard from.

The Most Liberal Supporter of Foreign Missions in the world is said to be Dr. John F. Gouchir. His wife and he support 173 foreign schools under Methodist auspices at a yearly expense of $12,975.

The National Gospel Mission Union Holds its first Annual Convention in Washington next week. The sessions will continue three days, Oct. 15, 16 and 17. Gospel Wagon excursions will be made and eminent Christian workers from all parts of the country will be present to institute their methods and confer on the best plans for rescuing the fallen. All particulars may be obtained by addressing Mr. G. G. Marten, 622 Louisiana Avenue, Washington.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, who was so Long identified with the work among Jews in New York, has resigned the pastorate of the North Park Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J. During his labors there the membership of the church has been considerably increased, and there is sincere regret expressed that he should feel it his duty to sever his connection with the church. Mr. Freshman will reside in New York preaching and lecturing, as opportunity offers, until the way is opened to another sphere of labor.

A Wonderful Work of Grace is in Progress in Baltimore, Md. Union meetings are held each day at noon and four o'clock and are largely attended. Every evening services are held in the various churches under the charge of Evangelists H. ... Wharton, Arthur Crane and Mr. Naylor, assisted by the pastors of the respective churches. A correspondent in Baltimore writes us that the work is like a great tidal wave sweeping over the city and is stirring Christian people into new energy and activity as well as bringing outsiders to Christ.

A Prince's Search for Health.

The Czarewitch's Lovely Home in a Valley of the Caucasus—Wealth and Power unable to Command Happiness.

THERE is no fortune in the world that makes one so rich as the fortune of good health, nor is there anything the world can bestow that brings us real happiness, unless the heart is right with God. History, ancient and modern, furnishes many illustrations of this. Men, rich as Cræsus, but ruined in health and troubled in spirit, have roamed the world vainly in search of rest and happiness. Others, also in feeble health, but opulent in spiritual graces, have gradually relaxed their hold on worldly affairs, and found comfort and consolation in the contemplation of a future state in which neither pain nor anxiety can find place.

Since his childhood, the health of the present Czarewitch of Russia has been the cause of anxiety to his friends. The late Czar regarded Grand Duke George as the weakling of the family. His constitution, never robust, became still more delicate as he advanced toward young manhood. Through many a long night his parents, the late Czar Alexander III. and the Czarina, kept vigil by his bedside, and even during the last illness of the Emperor, Prince George's frail health was a cause of many wakeful hours. It is stated that the stalwart father, who was built in a herculean mould, would often carry the invalid from room to room in his arms during the prince's frequent spells of sickness.

Since his father's death, the Prince's health has not improved. The Court physicians advised a sojourn in the bracing climate of Denmark, but instead of being beneficial to his weak lungs, as Professor Leyden had predicted, it proved the reverse, and he was lately ordered by his doctors to leave that country and go to the Caucasus. He was accordingly conveyed to the beautiful villa of Abbas Touman, situated in a valley of the Southern Caucasus. It is really a miniature palace, almost embosomed amid fragrant pine-woods, and in a climate which it is hoped may prove beneficial and healing. His home in the Caucasus is shown in the illustration on this page. According to cable dispatches, his condition on arrival was quite serious, the fatigue of the journey having exhausted his strength.

Grand Duke George is the second son of the imperial household, having been born May 9, 1871, three years after the birth of his elder brother, Nicolas, the present Czar. He has always been a prime favorite both in the home circle and the court. When the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD [illegible] 1892, as the envoy of Christian America to relieve the famine-stricken peasants, he had the pleasure of seeing the late Czar in the midst of his family at the royal palace of Peterhof. [illegible] seemed to have inherited the splendid physique of their father, but George was [illegible] of all, and his health even then was a cause of anxiety. He has since traveled over a [illegible] part of the globe, attended by [illegible] but the [illegible] malady, [illegible] which [illegible] were discovered some time ago, has now become so pronounced as to afford little hopes of ultimate recovery. There are three other children in the royal household besides Nicholas and George, viz: Grand Duchess Xenia, now a beautiful and accomplished young lady of twenty; Grand Duke Michael, in his eighteenth year, and Grand Duchess Olga, who is a girl of thirteen.

The Sabbath Spirit at Home.

The spirit of the entire day's observances ought to be a reverent spirit; but it should be understood by the parents that true reverence is better shown in gladness than in gloom. Where the Lord's day is counted a dismal one by the children, it is obvious that the parents have failed to train their children to hallow that day, as the day which is peculiarly sacred to the love of their loving Father in heaven. Whether at home, or at Sunday-school or any other church service, the children should be helped to realize that the day is a day of brightness and of cheer; that while differing in its occupations and enjoyments from all other days, it is the best of them all. When a little boy, out of a home thus ordered, heard one of his companions express, on Sunday, a wish that it was already Monday, the little fellow said, with evident heartiness.

"Why! don't you like Sunday? I like it best of all the days."

And so it ought to be the case with every boy and girl in a Christian home.

Don't Stagnate.

It's a great mistake to let one's self stagnate. Activity is the secret of continued energy and much happiness. Don't let the dust, the imperceptible dust, gather day by day, to clog and smother the things that you value. Activity is youth, health, life itself; disuse means stagnation and death. Enthusiasm is contagious—it is like fire, and will communicate itself, whether or no; love quickens the vital current; the right sort of love is what

Don't Interfere Too Much.

There is such a thing as overdone domestic discipline. A little wholesome letting alone forms a large part of the wise education of every child for the divinely implanted instinct of activity will lead it to use its powers as fast as they develop and no faster and so it will be safely educated into using them. It needs patience, tact and faith in God to refrain from meddling with the natural processes of child growth. We have learned not to interfere with plant unfolding. Let us carry the lesson into the realm of childhood.

Family Resemblances.

It has often been remarked that, after years of mutual association, husband and wife gradually grow to resemble each other, not only in tastes, but in facial appearance. Some curious investigations have recently been undertaken by a photographic society in Geneva. The purpose was to show that the longer a married coupled lived together—we apprehend harmoniously—the more and more marked became the resemblance which the two persons bore to each other. Photographs of seventy-eight couples were taken, as well as an equal number of adult brothers and sisters. On careful inspection it was found that the married couples were more like each other than the brothers and sisters of the same blood. Apparently, therefore, there seems to be a stronger force available for the production of "family likenesses" even than that of heredity.

Table-Talk as an Educator.

Fifty years ago, writes H. Clay Trumbull, a gentleman of New England had, as a philanthropist, an educator, and an author, an exceptional acquaintance with men of prominence in similar fields of endeavor in this country and abroad. His home was a place of resort for them. He had a large family of children, all of whom were permitted to be at the family table while those guests were present, as well as at other times. The table-talk in that home, between the parents and the guests, or between the parents and their children when no guests were present, was in itself "a liberal education." It gave to those children a general knowledge such as they could hardly have obtained otherwise. It was a source of promptings and of inspiration to them in a multitude of directions. Now that they are themselves parents and grandparents, they perceive how greatly they were the gainers by their training through the table-talk of their early home; and they are doing what they can to have the value of table-talk recognized as a training agency for the young.

DAILY LIFE.

ARE you watching for the Master
Day by day?
As each golden morn is breaking
Does the thought your spirit cheer
Maybe e'er the day is over He'll appear?

Are you walking with your Master
Day by day?
Simply walking on with Jesus,
Trusting Him for one step more;
Thankful that He veils the future
Yet in store?

Are you working for the Master
Day by day?
Are you gathering in some lost ones,
Following in the Saviour's track,
Till the Keeper of the vineyard
Cometh back!

Go on watching, waiting, working,
Day by day,
In the little time that's left you,
Even though the way be dark,
Press still onward, upward, heavenward
Toward the mark.

THAT DAY.

HAIL, hail that day
When, far away
From sin and woe,
My soul shall go
To thee on high!
My Lord, draw nigh.

Farewell to earth—
With my last breath,
On angel's wing
Mounting, I'll sing
Dear Lord on high,
My Lord, draw nigh.

Oh, blessed day,
Oh, heavenly way—
Through toil I'll go,
Nor respite know.
Till safe on high!
My Lord, draw nigh.

NAPOLEON'S "HAPPIEST DAY."

Not in worldly triumphs, nor in glory or fame does true happiness consist. When Napoleon was in the height of his prosperity and surrounded by a brilliant company of the marshals and courtiers of his empire, he was asked what day he considered to have been the happiest in his life. When all expected that he would name the occasion of some glorious victory, or some great political triumph, or some august celebration, or other signal recognition of his genius and power, he answered without a moment's hesitation, "The happiest day of my life was the day of my first Communion." At a reply so unforeseen there was a general silence, when he added, as if to himself, "I was then an innocent child."

A CHRISTIAN PASTOR'S DEATHBED.

Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, has recently sustained a severe loss in the death of his brother, Rev. James Edward Sharp of Marshall, Mo. Writing on the subject, Mr. Sharp pays a loving tribute to his brother in these words:

He had been a minister of the Gospel more than forty-four years. God blessed his ministry greatly. Many sinners were saved and saints were refreshed by his labors. It was at a meeting conducted by him that I, then a young lawyer, was led to take a decided stand for the Lord, and sometime afterwards I gave up the legal profession and entered the ministry. His last public discourse was preached in a sitting posture, as disease was already upon him. But his private discourses were the many blessed testimonies which flowed out of his sick chamber, not in one continued discourse, but from time to time during his illness of about two months. "If I must go," he said, "I do not see how I could die under more favorable circumstances. I cannot doubt my conversion—that was too clear. My trust is in the Lord." Another time he said: "This is a testing time. If this disease is to have a fatal termination, I would be glad it might end soon." Again he said: "I have no anxiety for the future. As I see my case, this is to end in blessing. If I go, that will be the best. If I get well, I shall be glad to preach and tell of the goodness of God. In either event, I see this trial will end in blessing."

He abounded from day to day in praises and thanksgiving to God, and saying, "Oh, what a wonderful Saviour." I visited him three times in his illness, going over a hundred miles to see him. Never did the words of the Apostle enter so fully into my heart, that the Saviour "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel," as they did when, from day to day, I heard my dear brother's testimony to the Lord's gracious, comforting, sustaining presence in view of death. His sick-room was fragrant with the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley. Glory be to God that having loved his own, he loved him to the end. He fell asleep at high noon, Aug. 8, without a struggle or a groan, aged 62 years, 6 months, and 25 days.

THE CLUE TO THE VISION.

The Explanation Given by the Angel to Daniel a Clue to the Interpretation of the Later Visions of the Prophet.

BY GEO. A. PEMBER, M. A.

IN the second group of results which were to come to the Jews from the discipline of the period of the "seventy sevens," there was to be, as already noticed, "the bringing in of everlasting righteousness." There was also a second result which the angel described as "sealing up vision and prophet." When sins are sealed up, vision and prophecy shall also be laid aside, as being no longer needed. For it was only after sin had come into the world that prophecy was introduced as an effective instrument of God in the war against it; and so, when sin is put away, prophecies also shall fail.

"To anoint a Holy of Holies." Lastly, in the place of the Tabernacle and former Temples, in which the covering, or propitiation, was wont to be typified, a new Holy of Holies shall be anointed. The Ark of the Covenant will not be found in the future Holy of Holies, neither shall it be any more remembered (see Jer. 3 : 16), but in its place will stand the Royal Throne on which the Messiah will sit. And it is, probably, this last change more than all others which will involve the necessity of a fresh anointing and consecration.

Such, then, will be the results of God's dealings with the Jews, at the close of the Four Hundred and Ninety Years. Their transgression will be restrained and their sins sealed up, so as no longer to affect them—for the stumbling-blocks will then have been consumed with the wicked: their iniquity will be expiated, and the new covenant of their God will confer everlasting righteousness upon them: all the promises will then be fulfilled: the law of God will be written on the heart of every Israelite, so that there will be no further need of the exhortations, rebukes, warnings, and threatenings, of the prophets: and Mount Zion will be crowned with a Temple, of which the building of Solomon was but a very faint type, and to which—as we are elsewhere told—the Cherubim and the Glory will return, to be a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night. So will the words of Haggai be fulfilled;—"The latter glory of this house shall be greater than the former, saith the Lord of Hosts: and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of Hosts."

We have now before us an outline of the whole prophecy. And, after considering the statement of results which are to follow God's disciplinary dealings, we cannot but conclude that the close of the Seventy Sevens must coincide with the end of the present order of things and the beginning of the Coming or Millennial Age. This is the clue which enlightened Daniel, and may help us.

In the remaining verses, the angel gives some particulars respecting the course of the Sevens, and, in doing this, answers two questions which would naturally have presented themselves to the mind of Daniel. These questions are:—What will be the commencing date of the Four Hundred and Ninety Years? And, when they have commenced, will their course be unbroken to the end of the period, or will it be at any point interrupted?

Ver. 25: "Know, therefore, and understand;—From the going forth of a commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto an Anointed One, a Prince, there shall be Seven Sevens and Sixty and Two Sevens: it shall be built again with street and moated wall, even under pressure of the times."

BOOK OF PSALMS.

PSALM 1.

Happiness of the godly, misery of the wicked.

BLESSED [a] is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the [1] ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.
2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.
3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not [2] wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall [b] prosper.
4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.
5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.
6 For [c] the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

PSALM 2.

Kingdom of Christ; 10 kings and judges exhorted to accept of it.

WHY do the heathen [1] rage, and the people [2] imagine a vain thing?
2 The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his [3] anointed, saying,
3 Let [b] us break their bands and cast away their cords from 4 He [c] that sitteth in the heave laugh: the Lord shall have the rision.
5 Then shall he speak unto the wrath, and [3] vex them in his pleasure.
6 Yet have I [4] set my king [5] holy hill of Zī'ŏn.
7 I will declare [6] the decree: t hath said unto me, [d] Thou art this day have I begotten thee.
8 Ask [e] of me, and I shall give heathen for thine inheritance, uttermost parts of the earth for session.
9 Thou [f] shalt break them with iron; thou shalt dash them in pi a potter's vessel.
10 Be wise now therefore, O y be instructed, ye judges of the e 11 Serve the LORD with fear, an with trembling.
12 Kiss [g] the Son, lest he be an ye perish from the way, when h is kindled but a little. Blessed they that put their trust in him.

Holy Land Flowers!

An Exceptional Opportunity Presented Exclusively to our Own Subscribers.

Our readers will be delighted to learn that we have a rich surprise in store for them—at least for those of them who quickly signify their wishes. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through Rev. H. B. Greene, has made in Palestine a varied and beautiful collection of flowers, whose value is enriched by Bible associations, and has pressed, preserved and bound them in album form. These albums are not only very handsome, but their value is beyond estimation. Dr. Talmage, who has seen them, writes:

You have all seen maps of Palestine, and heard sermons about Palestine, and sung hymns about Palestine, and longed for the opportunity of seeing Palestine, but this may be the first time you have ever held a part of Palestine in your hand. These are not pictures of flowers; any engraver or painter can give you them, but these were wrought, and spun, and colored by the hand of God. The ancestors of these flowers were touched by Moses, and Solomon, and Paul, and Christ. Through most of the year the Holy Land is all ablush with floral opulence. You find all the royal family of flowers there, some that you supposed indigenous to the far North, and others indigenous to the far South—the daisy, and hyacinth, crocus and anemone, tulip and water-lily, geranium and ranunculus, mignonette and sweet majoram. In the collection at Beyrout you may see eighteen hundred kinds of Holy Land flowers; while among trees are the oak of frozen climes, and the tamarisk of the tropics, walnut and willow, ivy and hawthorne, ash and elder, pine and sycamore.

Oh, the flowers! They are the angels of the grass. They all have voices. When the clouds speak, they thunder; when the whirlwinds speak, they shriek; when the cataracts speak, they roar; but when the flowers speak, they always whisper. Take this floral album to some quiet place and listen. Some of the flowers have different names now from those with which they were baptized in Bible times, but the change of name does not change their beauty, or aroma, or suggestiveness. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot do a lovelier thing than to put this Divine bouquet into the hands of its friends and patrons. The flower marks the exact line between the material world and the spiritual world. Heaven and earth meet at the white pillar of the calla lily. T. DEWITT TALMAGE.

These Floral Albums will be ready for delivery about the middle of November. They will not be advertised among outsiders, and only those subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who act very promptly will have an opportunity of securing one. The orders will be entered according to the postmarks, so that due allowance may be made for those who send from a distance. There are hardly enough of these Floral Albums to supply more than one in fifty of our subscribers, and it is absolutely out of the question to have any more made up, as no flowers can be gathered in Palestine for this purpose before next spring. The Album is bound in rich olive silk cloth, gold edges, with gold side and back stamp and a very attractive emblematic design on the cover. The contents are as follows:

Frontispiece—The Cedars of Lebanon.
Introduction by Rev. Dr. Talmage.
Certificate by U. S. Consul E. S. Wallace.
Commendatory by Hon. Selah Merrill.
The Flora of Palestine—by Rev. H. B. Greene.
Wild Flowers of Palestine—(Illustrated.)
Fifteen Depressed openings containing many beautiful specimens of real Palestine flowers.

These Albums of Palestine Wild-Flowers, with one year's extension of your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for $3.

As soon as enough orders have been received to exhaust the supply, the fact will be made known through the first paragraph of the "Brief Notes" in this paper.

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

CHAPTER XIII.

"THE OLD SACRISTAN LOOKED AT HER."

AT daybreak the pilgrims were awake, refreshed by their night's rest, but Nadja, who could not sleep until morning had drawn near, did not waken. Makari, whose heart was with the girl, ordered his little company to delay their setting out until her sleep was over. So they shaded her face from the light, and sat down to wait. The poor girl's night had been full of the bitterest memories and the most sombre forebodings. Her thoughts seemed to go round and round like the wheel of a water-mill, everything that she touched was tossed about, nothing grasped.

Thanks to the respite afforded her she wakened refreshed. Some rye-bread and a drink of water from the stream served her as breakfast, and the march was resumed. This day's tramp proved still more fatiguing than yesterday's; towards midnight it became scorching hot, the steppe shimmering, the horizon wavering unsteadily. Footsore, sick, and worn out, Nadja could go no farther, and the pilgrims, seeing her miserable plight, gladly accommodated themselves to her position. They rested in the shade of a ruined outhouse and drank tea until the sun was low in the west. Old Makari went on a catering expedition to a neighboring village, and brought back eggs and fresh bread and a big pan of milk. Every one did his or her best to contribute to Nadja's comfort, and as the hours went by her spirits rose and the over-powering fatigue which she could not understand, and which had often visited her of late, was hardly noticed.

Late in the afternoon Makari read his favorite Psalms and the Gospel for the day, and the little caravan again started, moving slowly and intending to walk far into the night. They went on and on over the wide-extending, now undulating, plains of brilliant green, with deepening shades in the hollows as the sun sank lower. On the vast girdle of steppe around them receding to the sky, they noticed at times some shadowy village in the dusky diffused light of evening, its white church tower and glittering golden cross rising above the surrounding haze like a lighthouse from a northern sea. And then night came on and the steppe became redolent, and the perfume of the flowers and herbs and spring grasses, hardly noticeable in the heat of the day, came about them and dwelt with them all the night through. It was long past midnight when they approached their resting-place. They had been gradually topping a long low hill which for an hour had narrowed their horizon, a long black ridge it looked in the moonlight. Makari drew near to Nadja.

"We're just at the top, my dear, and now you'll have a surprise. Do you see that winding white thing like a long broad ribbon over there? That's the river again. You will notice a misty dark shadow beyond it. That's the forest, the forest of pines, the great strong, straight pines that we love. They say on the Viatka that the smell of them keeps disease and death away. In winter, my dear, you hear the howling of wolves in that forest over there. But look!" he pointed a little to the left and the pilgrims gathered round him in the moonlight. "What's that shining there?" His eyes gleamed with excitement. "And near it something big, but not shining so brightly, and that long white shadow! Ah, that is the cross over the holy Lavra—in the darkest night it shines just as brightly as during the day to guide pilgrims; and beside it is the great dome of St. Sophia's, although when you get to Kief you will find a good long distance between them. And that tall white thing is the bell tower at the Lavra, and when we hear its bells to-morrow, my little brothers and sisters, our wanderings will be over and our hearts will be glad. Lord have mercy!" exclaimed the old pilgrim, falling on his knees. Every one followed his example, and they strained their eyes out across the moonlit river, and along the dark pine forests to where the shining cross rose high in the heavens over the shrines of Kief.

It was towards mid-day that the pilgrims approached the city and saw each glittering dome and cupola coming out into clearer outline and rising nobly on the lofty bank of the wide stream. They went on through trees, and Nadja long remembered the luxurious green and rustle of their leaves, and the shadow-dappled path among the beeches and oaks, with glimpses of sunny greensward and shining river seen through the boughs. They made their way through the picturesque streets to the hospices prepared for the reception of such as they were. They walked in silence, touched and thrilled with the sombre solemnities of the place, and Nadji, notwithstanding her wretchedness and misery, felt compelled to accept the spirit of the old pilgrim city, and to believe that healing, or at any rate comfort, was at hand.

When Makari and his party started out on their first expedition to the catacombs she preferred to remain in the hospice, and pleaded weariness. She wished to be by herself a little, to collect her thoughts, and settle some plan for the future. Perhaps she could get work somewhere. She had heard of girls who had gone to Kief and even to Moscow to seek work. But she did not know how to set about it. She would confide part of her story to Makari when he returned, and ask his advice: he was a good man and knew Kief.

The pilgrims had said they would not be home until evening, and Nadja, feeling refreshed, and having an hour or two to spare, took courage to leave the hospice and wander down through some long bare streets into the town, into the graceful Kreshtchatik, one of the pleasantest streets in Europe. Nadja knew Kief in a way, that is to say she had read what her father's books said about it, and she felt a shock of delighted surprise once or twice in her wanderings when she noticed a church or street corner that had helped to illustrate her books. She wondered at the soaring white campaniles and clustering golden domes rising over many a stately street vista: and as the sun got low the mixture of strange and melancholy harmonies from the bells pealing for vespers, brought somehow a message of peace to her that was inexpressibly comforting.

Up one long hilly street she went, to a church whose bells she thought were sweeter than the rest. It was built high on a lofty terrace, overlooking the broad reaches of the Dnieper. An old woman sitting on the steps to the terrace told her it was the cathedral of St. Andrew. Its western front and silvered dome blazed in the lowering sun. Nadja would not go inside — the glories of the outside filled her to overflowing as she stood on the terrace, and listened on the lee side to the sigh of the wind, and looked down on the gleaming river, and the immense plain with the mellowing light stealing over it, and the far distant fringe of blue pines, where Makari told her the wolves howl at night.

Hours on that high terrace would not have broken this peasant girl's enchantment at the wonderful scene. But the day was waning and the pilgrims would soon be home. She could not, however, resist the pleasure of finding for herself another way to the hospice, so, speeding through a colorless and tame street that had nothing to interest her, she arrived at an open and dusty square and stood still in wonder and delight.

"St. Sophia's, St. Sophia's!" she exclaimed, "I know it; that's the bell tower."

Nadja longed to enter the famous cathedral, perhaps the most venerated place in Russia, but here, as at St. Andrew's, the outside had also its irresistible power over her. She entered the low gateway under the majestic campanile and gazed at the exquisite mouldings that adorned its gleaming sunlit walls. The vendors of beads and amulets and many another piece of wood and shell and stone from Jerusalem or dipped in Jordan, sat in the gateway. She passed into a fair open space with trees, and before her stood the strange ugly mass of the cathedral, with dingy walls and the undisturbed dust thick on them, with jutting and irregular corners, apses and little chapels and deep cornices, doves resting and cooing or fluttering about in an altogether aimless and happy sort of way. From the blinding light of the roof she turned to the squat walls and they looked cold, with their patches of dark green moldiness — weather stains, and trailing weeds, and withered stalks of grass in corners.

The poor girl had never felt so lonely or so stricken. On the lofty terrace of St. Andrew's she had light, and space, and air, a sense of freedom and of a beyond. Here before the low portal of the cathedral her sorrows flooded in on her, and the tears, bravely held back so long, could be pent up no longer.

To seek some corner gloomier than the rest where she might escape observation and pray, was her only thought as she entered the dark church, where the pervading perfume of incense hung heavy in the air, where the gloom was only made gloomier by the twinkling of tapers and colored lampadas hung before the icons.

Service was concluding at one of the altars as she entered, one of the innumerable services of the Greek church. There was the solemn chanting of monks and the long drawn mournful sweetness of some boys' voices — all unutterably sad, all weighing heavily on a heart that wanted cheering, that wanted some word of intelligible sympathy. Here and there were the scattered forms of worshippers standing or kneeling in different parts of the nave, bowing, crossing themselves, prostrating themselves, some sighing and weeping in distant corners, sorrowing for those who had left them lonely or were about to leave them — ineffectual, pathetic, almost tragic figures silent there in the obstructed light of the old sanctuary.

When the chanting ceased there was not a sound but the echo of an occasional slow footstep to disturb the deathlike stillness of the place.

With her colored handkerchief low over her face Nadja sought a distant corner where no one was. She sank on a low seat at the base of a massive square pillar, and looked around at the icons, trying to decide before which she should kneel. Her eyes took in the quiet patient brown faces of old world monks and nuns with perpendicular Greek and Slavic inscriptions written around or below them, with something to tell in their faces the like of which one is not used to hear. But she passed them by. There were exquisitely sweet faces of Virgins and Babes. There were enraptured visages of inspired prophets and martyrs dimly posturing through the grime and smoke and mishaps of centuries. But none of them penetrated to the girl's sorrow; they had no message for her, no satisfying actuality.

One streaming shaft of light athwart the dome fell on the picture of a crowd of worshipping monks with woe-begone gaunt visages and world-worn eyes; and under their feet she read through her tears the pathetic invitation in old Slavic letters, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." She knew the words. She remembered them in Mikhail's New Testament. She knew who spake the words, and from her darkening place below the pillar she turned her wistful blue eyes again and again upward to the molten dusky light of the dome. "Come unto Me," knocked hard at her heart.

From the glory of the dome she tried to pierce the gloom around her, and for a moment or two could not, but at last the brown icons with their dull metal plaques reappeared, and she shuddered as she thought of home and the Wonder-Worker. She shrank farther into the gloom, crouching along the wall, hardly knowing, certainly not caring, where she went. All at once her gaze was riveted on a picture, old, dingy, unheeded in a corner, a picture of Supreme Act, the Great Sacrifice, and knelt before it in awe. O, the agon face with the clotted hair crowning through which the sharp thorns shov O, the lonely anguish in the closing e and the bleeding hands and heart and The things that Mikhail had told h the happier days came crowding upon memory. It was the Crucified One had said, "Come unto me," but how c she come, how find the rest? For awhile her own personal sor were swallowed up in her unspeakable for the Man of Sorrows. She sobbed able to restrain herself. A monk, th sacristan, who was going his roun tinguishing tapers before closing the dral for the night, heard her and tu look in that direction. He felt sorr way, but he had seen in his forty ye the old church many a sobbing womar passed on. THE GOLDEN RULE IN SOCIETY.*

OUR modern perfection of exchange and division of labor cannot last without equal perfection of morals and sympathy. Every one is living at the mercy of every one else in a way entirely peculiar to our times. Nothing is any longer made by one man; parts of things are made by parts of men, and become wholes by the help of a good-humor which so far keeps men from flying asunder. It takes a whole company to make a match. A hundred men will easily produce a hundred million matches, but not one of them could make one match. No farm gets its plough from the cross-roads blacksmith, and no one in the chilled-steel factory knows the whole of the plough. The life of Boston hangs on a succession of reciprocities which must come, as steadily and sweetly as the roll of the planets, between its bakeries, the Isle of St. Anthony, and the valley of the Red River. Never was there a social machinery so delicate. Only on terms of love and justice can men endure contact so close. The breakdown of all other civilizations has been a slow decay. It took the Northern hundreds of years to march to the Nile. They grew their way through the civil society as the tree planting itself on a grave is found to have sent its roots along every fibre and muscle of the dead. Our social is not the simple thing there was, of little groups sufficient to themselves, if need be. New York would begin to die to-morrow if it were not for Illinois and Dakota. We cannot afford a revulsion in the hearts by whose union locomotives run, mills turn, factories move. Practical men are calculating to-day on the possibility that our civilization may some afternoon be blown away by the tick of a telegraph. All these co-operations can be scattered by a word of hate too many, and we left, with power to make a plough or a match, a civilization cut off as by the Roman curse of food and fire. Less sensitive civilizations than ours have burst apart.

History has taught us nothing if men do not continue to associate by the laws of association. The golden rule is the first and last of these, but the first and last of the golden rule is that it can be operated only through laws, habits, forms, and institutions. The Constitution and laws of the United States are, however imperfectly, the translation into the language of politics of doing as you would be done by—the essence of equal rights and government by consent. To ask individuals to-day to lead by their single sacrifices the life of the miner in the world of business is as if the American colonist had been asked to lead by his individual enterprise the life of the citizen of a republic. That was made possible to him only by union with others. The business world is full of men who yearn to abandon its methods and live the love they feel—but to attempt to do so by themselves would be martyrdom, and that is "caviare to the general." "We admire martyrdom," Mazini, the martyr, said, "but we do not recommend it." The change must be social, for its martyrdoms have already begun.

The new self-interest will remain unenlightened in business until we invent the ways by which the vast multitudes who have been gathered together in modern production can organize themselves into a people there as in government. Nothing but his institutionalization will save them from being scattered away from each other again, and it can be achieved only by such arranging and concessions and co-operations as are in the price of all union. These must be gains, not losses.

There can be no public prosperity without public virtue, and no public virtue without private virtue. But private cannot be public except by organization. Our efforts at control, regulation, are but the agitations of the Gracchi, evidencing the wrong, but not rising to the cure. We are waiting for some genius of good who will generalize into one body of doctrine our partial truths of reform, and will help us live the generalization.

CONSOLATION IN ADVERSITY.†

THE idea of the elegist is in line with a familiar stream of Hebrew thought, and his very words have many an echo in the language of prophet and psalmist, as, for example, in the forty-fifth psalm, where we read, "Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever."

The grand Messianic hope is founded on the conviction that the ultimate establishment of God's reign throughout the world will be the best blessing imaginable for all mankind. Sometimes this is associated with the advent of a Divinely anointed earthly monarch of the line of David. At other times God's direct sovereignty is expected to be manifested in the "Day of the Lord." The failure of the feeble Zedekiah seems to have discredited the national hopes centred in the royal family. For two generations they slumbered, to be awakened in connection with another disappointing descendant of David, Zerubbabel, the leader of the return. No king was ever equal to the satisfaction of these hopes until the Promised One appeared in the fulness of the times, until Jesus was born into the world to come forth as the Lord's Christ. Meanwhile, since the royal house is under a cloud, the essential Messianic hope turns to God alone. He can deliver his people and he only. Even apart from personal hopes of rescue, the very idea of the eternal, just reign of God above the transitory thrones of men is a calming, reassuring thought.

It is strange that this idea should ever have lost its fascination among Christian people who have so much more gracious a revelation of God than was given to the Jews under the old covenant; and yet our Lord's teachings concerning the Fatherhood of God have been set forth as the direct antithesis of the Divine sovereignty, while the latter has been treated as a stern and dreadful function from which it was natural to shrink with fear and trembling. But the truth is the two attributes are mutually illustrative; for he is a very imperfect father who does not rule his own house, and he is a very inadequate sovereign who does not seek to exercise parental functions towards his people. Accordingly, the gospel of Christ is the gospel of the kingdom. Thus the good news declared by the first evangelists was to the effect that the kingdom of God was at hand, and our Lord taught us to pray, "Thy kingdom come." For Christians, at least as much as for Jews, the eternal sovereignty of God should be a source of profound confidence, inspiring hope and joy.

PULPIT AND SCHOOL.‡

THE church is the mightiest, most pervasive, most beneficent force in our civilization. It affects, directly or indirectly, all human activities and interests. It is a large property-holder, and influences the market for real estate. It is a corporation, and administers large trusts. It is a public institution, and is therefore the subject of protective legislation. It is a capitalist, and gathers and distributes large wealth. It is an employer, and furnishes means of support to ministers, organists, singers, janitors, and others. It is a relief organization, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and assisting the destitute. It is a university, training children and instructing old and young by public lectures on religion, morals, industry, thrift, and the duties of citizenship. It is a reformatory influence, recovering the vicious, immoral, and dangerous elements of society and making them exemplary citizens. It is organized beneficence, founding hospitals for the sick, asylums for orphans, refuges for the homeless, and schools, colleges, and universities for the ignorant. Every cornerstone it lays, it lays for the world; its ministers are messengers of good tidings, ambassadors of hope, and angels of mercy. What is there among men to compare with the church in its power to educate, elevate, and civilize mankind?

—Henry K. Carroll.

The fireside, the pulpit, the school, and the shop must be linked and leagued together. Each must help every other. Home must connect itself in all its firm authorities, sweet affections, and tender influences, with pulpit, school, and shop. Pulpit must send its reverence, faith, and hope, its lofty moral and religious standards and its sacred magnetism into home, school, and shop. School must reach with its habits of honest, concentrated, and continuous thinking, its wealth of learning and its broad horizons, pulpit, home, and shop, and shop must put its knowledge of men and things, its tact, industry, and economy, and its wholesome common-sense into the administrations of the family, the utterances of the pulpit, and the instructions of the school.

A Little Child.

NO, strange as it sounds to tell it, De Forest Smythe and his wife haven't spoken to one another in ten years!"

"You don't say so? How do they manage to get along? It must be mightily inconvenient to say the least."

"Of course, but both DeForest and Kitty are fearfully proud, and awfully set in their ways. Now, they don't live together. He has gone to Jane's, his daughter's, up the hill, and she is living at Ned's, the son's, down the hill. They don't come in contact much. They sit opposite each other in church, like two old graven images, and hymns and prayers and sermons, them bein' so sure both of 'em that they are right, and the 'tother one wrong, just float off them like water off a duck's back. Passes me, how they can say the Lord's Prayer, but they do, for I've watched, and they don't even balk at 'Forgive us our debts.'"

"What made them quarrel?"

"Nobody knows. Neither of them ever told, but it's supposed it was over the meadow-lot, which De Forest wanted to sell, and couldn't unless Kitty 'd give her consent, and sign her name. He got her to the lawyer's office s'posin' she 'd be ashamed to refuse there, but she was clear grit, and walked out and went home to her churnin' leavin' her husband standin' there like a fool, and madder 'n all possessed. Dan Stacey saw him go into his own gate black as a thunder cloud. He heard the churn stop, and them two said a few words to one another, but he couldn't make out what they was, he bein' in the barn door. Then DeForest come out the kitchen walkin' sort o' slow and stumblin' like, and white as a sheet.

"From that time on, while the children were to home, they'd make go-betweens of them. 'Jane, your father 'll have the bread,' 'Ned, ask your mother if she's goin' to town, and if she needs any money.' Inconvenient and round about, but folks can get along that way, when they have to. And she wouldn't ask his pardon, and he wouldn't ask hers, and as for the south meadow-lot, it lies fallow, and has done so ever since the quarrel."

The Smythes were people of substance, both college graduates, and they had loved one another dearly. In truth, under the hard crust of a ten years' silence, beneath the bitterness of a separation as final, apparently as if it had been dictated by law, they loved each other still. The human heart is a queer, contradictory thing. De Forest Smythe, from under his shaggy eye-brows watched his wife with keen, critical eyes; blue eyes that could smite like a scimitar. Ah! they had once melted as ice melts in the spring, with yearning affection for her. But he never expected to speak to her again.

"She's straight as a sapling, if she is fifty years old," he said to himself. "And white hair is becoming to her, poor Kitty. If only she wasn't so headstrong. The idea of her daring to set herself against me, about my land. But she's the only woman who ever dared to stand up to me! I admire her, but I'll never forgive her, never!" So ran his thoughts, as he sat in church, on the opposite aisle from his wife, in their son's pew, she, in his daughter's. And the minister went on preaching.

And Kitty, furtively surveying her handsome husband, thought to herself, "How well he carries his grey head, but he stoops a little, and Jenny does not put the gloss on his linen, she ought to." A mist dimmed her soft brown eyes. She remembered a day years ago when in that very church the old pastor, not this one, but his grandfather, had said:

"Wilt thou, Kitty, have this man, De Forest, for thy wedded husband, for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse, till death do ye part?"

And "yes" was what she had said, meaning it, and now they were parted, but not by death.

One morning, very early, De Forest Smythe came to his son's door.

"Ned," he said, "tell your mother that Jane wants her. The baby and Eleanor are both sick. Little Nell is very badly off. The doctor's been there for hours."

"Mother ought to have known it sooner, father; why didn't they send?"

"Your mother's not so strong as she was, Ned, and I didn't want her to be disturbed."

It did not take long for Mrs. Smythe to reach her grandchild's bedside. Diptheria often does its work quickly, and sometimes so swiftly that there are time for few farewells.

The sick child looked eagerly around to see if her dear ones were all present. Then, reaching one hot hand to grandpapa, and and one to grandmamma, she said the verse she had recited last Sunday in her class, sweetly, loudly, her eyes fixed on the two broken-hearted old faces: "Little—children—love—one—another!" a gasp between the linked words. Then the light faded from the sweet eyes, the bereaved mother threw herself on her mother's breast with a long, low, wailing cry, and DeForest Smythe—the fountain of his strong man's tears rent at last—gathered his wife and daughter into a long embrace.

"Kitty, Kitty, Kitty," he sobbed, "pardon a stubborn, wicked old man, who has loved you all along."

"Dearie," answered the wife, "I've been sorry for ten years. I'll sign my name tomorrow."

And as they were thus reconciled, there was joy in the presence of the angels of God, where one more little white-robed saint was being led to the Throne, and up to the seat where the Lord welcomes the dear little children to heaven.

That day had Christ gone into his garden to gather lilies. And the perfume of that gathered lily, made fragrant the rest of the journey for the two old people who had sinned and repented. So true it is that, through the ages, of the fierce and the vindictive, the cold and the unloving, it may still be said, "And a little child shall lead them."

NEW HEBRIDES MISSIONS.

Probably no mission field in the world affords a more gratifying instance of continued success than that of the New Hebrides. Not only has there been good work done on shore, but the means of communicating between island and island, and between the groups and Australia have been multiplied as the work advanced. The first vessel engaged in connection with the mission was the "Columba," of five tons: the second, the "John Knox;" the third, the "Dayspring," and the fourth, a second "Dayspring." For the last five years the mission has been served mainly by steamers. The first "Dayspring" was driven ashore in a hurricane in 1873, after ten years' service; the second, after fifteen years' service, having become too small and too slow, was sold. The "Rob Roy," the present inter-island steamer is 369 tons, and another, the ocean-going "Katoomba," is 1006 tons.

HUMAN SACRIFICES IN INDIA.

A shocking story comes from India, of human sacrifice to the heathen gods. The son of a Hindu, the last survivor of several brothers, was taken seriously ill. The father, in despair, consulted a Brahmin soothsayer, who recommended a human sacrifice (we presume to Kali); and undertook, for a small consideration, to obtain a victim. With another accomplice he succeeded in kidnapping a boy, the son of a laborer, and after having brought him to the invalid, who was made to lay his hands upon him, removed him to his own house, where the ceremony was thus enacted: A fowl was first of all brought and torn in two while still living. Next a goat was brought in, and despatched in a similarly barbarous manner. Lastly, the child was enticed in, by the promise of a good meal, and strangled, his blood being then mingled with that of the other victims. The father of the murdered boy, in anxiety as to his disappearance, traced him as far as the house, and gave notice to the police, who arrested both perpetrators on suspicion. Eventually one was induced to turn Queen's evidence on the other, and the frightful story was elicited. A similar attempt was made at Kali Ghat a year or two ago, but was fortunately stopped in time.

CONSUMPTION.

THE DREAD DRAGON OF THE HUM FAMILY FINALLY CONQUERED.

Dr. Robert Hunter, the Med Scientist, Editor and Author, A a Period of Research Extend Over Fifty Years, Announces the World the Discovery o Specific Remedy for This Her fore Fatal Malady — A Scien Discussion of the Disease, Causes, Treatment and Cure.

The recent publications in regard to consum led to the seeking of an interview with Dr. R Hunter, the consumption specialist, of No. 117 Forty-fifth street, this city.

The writer, on being ushered into the prese Dr. Hunter, was immediately impressed b strong personality—a man of gigantic frame, proportioned, upon whose broad shoulders is p a magnificently shaped head, with a face outline and features are strikingly classical impresses one as being a gladiator both in phy and intellect.

The history of Dr. Hunter is an interestin He was one of the first consumptive special this country, and has been engaged in acti search in this field for over fifty years. He 1855 the editor of "Hunter's Medical Speciali Journal of Diseases of the Chest," which had motto "The cultivation of a spirit of Free In which is not shackled by usage or tradition while it has all due reverence for the labors past, finds their best use in furnishing mate greater progress in the future." It was a n piece in its line, and nothing abler has since be tributed to this branch of medical literature. also the author of "The Principles and Pr of Inhalation," "The Story of Consumption a Treatment," and of numerous pamphlets co ing consumption and its treatment. He is nized by the medical profession as being a in the scientific investigation of this disea statements concerning it being accepted as puted authority. He adopted the germ th Martin, Barron Carmichael and Lanza in 185 a thorough investigation, and has since the cessfully maintained it as the only doctrine th bodied the true cause of consumption.

This germ theory is now the accepted doct the medical profession throughout the worl it was not until 1891 (forty years after Dr. proclaimed it in the "Specialist") that Dr. Koch, of Berlin, demonstrated its indisputabl by finding the particular germ that caus sumption in the sputum and tissues of the l those afflicted, and thus forced the profes publicly adopt it. When Dr. Koch propo treat consumption by injecting a poisonous virus into the veins of consumptives Dr. foresaw its failure, and wrote a pamphlet denc it as a dangerous delusion which was certa sult in injury instead of benefit. His ju proved prophetic, for it caused the death o numbers, and aggravated the sufferings and of all who submitted to it. Dr. Hunter's co was that no poisonous animal compound o sive drugs could ever be safely introduced human blood or could benefit the lungs in th "To cure consumption," said he, "it is nece discover and apply to the germs and germ- parts remedies sufficiently powerful to dest expel them. Such remedies can only be ap the germs by inhaling them into the lungs all the danger lies." His efforts became on this one purpose to discover such a reme he has now perfected his cure and proved cess. Hundreds have been cured by it, all parts of the Union patients have ap him, and send grateful thanks for its and life-saving power in their cases. No discovery, we will venture to say, of our destined to create so profound a sensation out the whole world as this announcemen finding of a perfected remedy and certain consumption by so eminent and celebrated physician as Dr. Robert Hunter. He seems a veritable storehouse of medic and clinical experience in all that pertains lungs and their diseases. Not only has he a cure for consumption, but he has recently vented an instrument for preventing it by ex and strengthening weak and obstructed thereby improving their breathing and power.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

The Rev. C. H. Mead Asks the Help of the Readers of "The Christian Herald" in Supporting its Work.

THE scores of letters and the many kind expressions by word of mouth, received from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in reference to my sketches that have appeared from time to time, make me feel as if I had secured for my characters a place in their hearts, as well as an interest in the writer. The publisher and editors of this journal have been more than kind to me in the past, and a new proof of their friendship is given in an unsolicited offer to me to make an appeal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fireside circle of friends, for my new work as Field Secretary of the National Temperance Society. For twenty-five years that Society has been doing the only distinctive temperance missionary work among the colored people in the South. As far as the means would allow, text-books on Alcohol and Hygiene have been put into the universities and schools, papers, tracts, and books have been scattered, and colored missionaries put into the field. The results have been marvelous and far-reaching, but lack of means has left much of the territory untouched. The appeals that reach me from colored preachers and teachers, rob me of many a night's sleep, and it is as natural as breathing for the tears to come to my eyes, and the prayers to my lips. I am trying, under God, to serve my day and generation the best I know how, and that is my one excuse for making this appeal for help. The financial distress of the past three years has brought a debt upon the National Temperance Society of more than $8,000. Unless that debt is speedily wiped out, the work in the South must cease. I think it would break my heart for it to stop; I know it would bring discouragement to a race that is making a brave struggle against fearful odds. If the hundreds of thousands of readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will come to the help of the Society, even in small sums, they will wipe out the debt, lighten my heart, cheer a struggling race, bring to themselves a blessing, and put me under an obligation that I will try and make good with my pen, by sending more frequent sketches to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as soon as my load of care is removed. I send out this appeal with a prayer for God's blessing upon the proprietor and publishers, and editors and readers of a journal that is doing so much to make the world brighter and better.

Spring No. 2. Nature's Anti-Dyspeptic, Anti-Malarial Water—Its Value in Uric-Acid Trouble. The Best Table Water.

Dr. ROBERTS BARTHOLOW, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Materia Medica and General Therapeutics in the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, etc.: "The Buffalo Lithia Water is the best table water known to me: and I have some experience of them all."

Rev. MOSES A. HOGE, D.D., of the Synod of Virginia, Richmond, Va.: "I have for some time made use of no water for drinking purposes but Buffalo Lithia Water No. 2, and since using it I have enjoyed the best health of my life."

Hon. ROGER A. PRYOR, New York:
"I have been so essentially benefitted by the use of your

that I feel it my duty, with your permission, to make formal acknowledgment of my obligation to you.
"For many years I have suffered severely from Dyspepsia and Insomnia, but after drinking the Water for six months I found myself entirely relieved of these painful maladies. To no other cause besides the use of the Water can I attribute my recovery, nor do I know of any auxiliary agent that conduced to my cure.
"I am inclined to think that I am mainly indebted to the Water No. 2. I may add that several gentlemen here of my acquaintance concur in my estimate of the salutary efficacy of the Buffalo Lithia Water."

Hon. DANIEL E. SICKLES, New York:
"By the advice of my physician I have used

for Dyspepsia and Uric-Acid trouble, and with decidedly beneficial results."

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, New York:
"Buffalo Lithia Water was first brought to my notice last year while suffering from severe MALARIAL DISORDER. I say 'MALARIAL' because the doctors said so. After trying other remedies, without benefit, I found prompt relief from the Water; and when there has been any return of my unpleasant symptoms it has always relieved me. Several to whom I have recommended it make like favorable report of it. I am a strong believer in its power as an ANTIDOTE to the ACIDS, which it neutralizes. I have pleasure in saying this, and shall continue to advice my neighbors and acquaintances to try the Water."

Hon. M. W. RANSOME, late U. S. Senator from North Carolina: "I regard Buffalo Lithia Water as the great remedy for our national disease, Dyspepsia. Both my wife and myself have derived decided benefit from it, and I feel that I cannot too strongly recommend it to sufferers from this painful malady."

SEEMING AND BEING.

An Address by Rev. J. Reid Howatt.
Text: "Ephraim is a cake not turned." Hos. 7 : 8.

THIS is a strange text, but there are so many strange people in the world that odd words are sometimes needed to reach them. God speaks to people in ways they shall understand: to scholars he speaks scholarly, which is always simply; to shepherds he speaks as a Shepherd; and he breaks up great truths into little portions for children. Many might not understand about stars, or geography, or history, but all can understand about a cake. You can!—very well, too! Suppose you saw a nice-looking cake in a shop window, and bought it, but found when you took the first bite that it was nasty—brown and beautiful on the one side, but damp and doughy on the other—then you would say that it was a cake that had not been turned while baking. It was only half-baked, and you would say it was a deceit. There are people like that; they look so beautiful and good when in church, or when they want you to see them at their best; but when you come to try them, they are anything but pleasant. They are cakes not turned.

Here is a boy, for example, who has to learn five questions by heart, with their answers. But he thinks he will get off easily if he learns only the fifth question and its answer, and places himself the fifth in the class. But when the master comes, he begins with him; and he cannot tell the first or the second question, or any but the fifth. He is a cake not turned; he pretended he had learnt all, but had not. He was deceiving.

Here, again, is a girl: she has got some sewing to do, and when she is asked if she has done it, and she says she has. Yes; but how? With great wide stitches, an inch or two long, when they should have been closer together than the teeth of a comb. She is a cake not turned.

Jesus was once speaking of this kind of thing, and took cups and saucers for his text. "Be thorough," he said, never deceive; if you pretend to wash the cups and saucers, wash them both inside and out. Do not wash the outside only, and make-believe about the inside. And do the same with you characters. If you pretend to be good, then be good, inside and out,—in your heart and your thoughts, as well as in your appearance."

And that is what this cake is meant to teach—Be thorough; do not try to appear to be what you are not. When you are very sick and ill, and your face is pale, and you are in danger of dying, the doctor does not come and say, "Ah! you do not look well, we must make you look better," and then begin to paint your face, so as to give you the color of health. If he only did that, you would die with the paint on your face! But the doctor is wiser, and tries to make you well inside; once he succeeds in doing that, you soon come to look well outside. He makes you healthy, and then you seem healthy. And that is always the best way to seem good—by being good. What is the good of seeming good if your thoughts are bad, and if you like in your heart to listen to naughty stories, and to repeat wicked words? God can see what is within as clearly as he can see what is without; and though you might look well in the eyes of others, God can see when you are only as a cake not turned. Try to be thorough in everything, inside and out, and through and through.

Sometimes you say, "I would like to be good and true, and love Jesus rightly, only I would like first of all to do this thing, though it is bad, or go to that place, though it is wrong, if—if—if!" That reminds me of an old fisherman we shall call John Brand, for, I am sorry to say, I have forgotten his real name. The fishing had not been good for some days, the water had been wild and stormy; but at length, on the Sabbath, the weather became fine, and the other fishermen said: "We shall have to go to the Sabbath meeting—we have had so few fish lately; and we are sorry to go to-day—but the weather is so good. It is a pity; we would not go if we were not so poor." "What!" said Brand to him, "Are you going to break God's laws with your ifs and buts? Better be poor than be wicked. My religion is not the kind that flies with the wind. 'Thou shalt remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy'—that is enough for me."

So he persuaded them, and they took his advice, and spent the time in worshipping God. And it was well they did so; for that night, just when the boats would have been coming back, a terrible storm suddenly burst over the deep, and lasted two days. Any boat out in that weather would certainly have been wrecked. But two days after, the beautiful weather returned, and more fish were taken then than had been caught for weeks before.

No; no one ever yet lost by obeying God. Be you like John Brand; be thorough, honest and God-fearing in and out; do not have a religion like a weathercock that shifts with the wind, or one that can be broken with an "if" or a "but."

God sees you always, and sees you altogether. A great sculptor in Greece, long ago, made a statue that was to be set on a high column, yet he was as particular about the hair on the top of the statue's head as about all the rest. "Why should you take such pains about that?" someone asked him; "for no man will be able to see the top of the head when the figure is on the column." "No," said the sculptor; "but God will see it."

So with you, my little friend, so with you; therefore be thorough, inside and out, and through and through. Be true in heart if you would be true in life, for it is out of the heart that life comes.

A BRAVE AFRICAN CONVERT.

A remarkable story is related of a native African girl—a Christian convert—named Nyangandi, who lived near the Ogowe River, West Africa. One Saturday she came in her canoe with two bunches of plantains to sell to the missionary. When she was going away, Mrs. Batchelor, the missionary's wife said to her: "Now, you must not forget that to-morrow will be the Sabbath day, and you have already promised to come every time." "Yes," said the girl, "I will surely come if I am alive." And so she did; but no one knew how she got there, until at the close of the service she told the girls that in the night her canoe had been stolen, and none of her friends would lend her one; but she had promised to come to church, and so she felt she must. She swam all the way! The current was swift, the water deep, and the river fully a third of a mile wide: but by swimming diagonally she succeeded in crossing the river. If this heathen girl, who knew only a little about the Gospel, could take so much pains to keep her word and honor the Sabbath day, how much more should favored Christian people do so.

How many pale folk there are! People who have the will, but no power to bring out their vitality. People who swing like a pendulum between strength and weakness—so that one day's work causes six days' sickness! People who have no life for resisting disease—thin people, nerveless delicate!

The food for all such is Scott's Emulsion. The hypophosphites of lime and soda, with the oil, will tone up the system, give the blood new life, improve the appetite and keep up digestion!

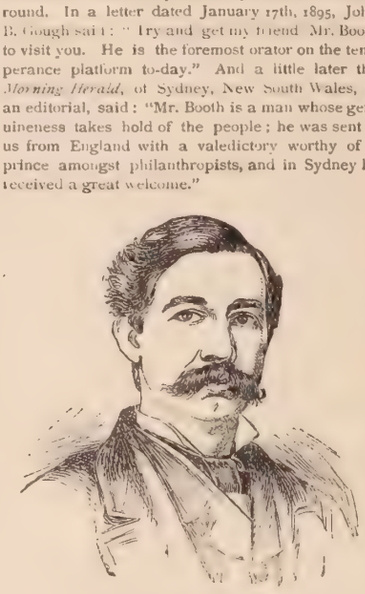
RICHARD T. BOOTH.

Friend and Co-Worker of Spurgeon and Gough.

We present to our readers this week the portrait and a brief history of a remarkable man, with a wonderful career in philanthropic work the world round. In a letter dated January 17th, 1895, John B. Gough said: "Try and get my friend Mr. Booth to visit you. He is the foremost orator on the temperance platform to-day." And a little later the Morning Herald, of Sydney, New South Wales, in an editorial, said: "Mr. Booth is a man whose genuineness takes hold of the people; he was sent to us from England with a valedictory worthy of a prince amongst philanthropists, and in Sydney he received a great welcome."



RICHARD T. BOOTH.

Mr. Booth, who is a native of Ithica, New York, has given the best years of his life, and almost life itself, to the cause of social reform. As one result of his labors in his own and foreign lands, one million converts were enrolled. It is easy enough to write "a million converts," but it is not so easy to put in words "the battle sieges and fortunes" which such a conquest implies. Who can tell the toils and trials, the places visited, the miles of land and seas traversed, the expenditure of vital energy, the mental anxiety, the day journeyings and night watches that lie below those million converts, and of which they are the flower and crown.

It was in September, 1882, while holding a series of meetings in the London Tabernacle, made famous by the great Spurgeon, who was Mr. Booth's staunch friend and co-worker, that the first serious breakdown occurred. The strain of speaking nightly to six or seven thousand people was too much. He was taken to Broadlands, the country seat of the late Lord Palmerston, where he was nursed and cared for by his friends, Lord and Lady Mount-Temple, and from whence he was sent to the south of France. His lungs now gave way entirely, and after struggling for a year against his rapidly developing disease, he was sent to Australia by the late Dr. Sir Andrew Clark, Mr. Gladstone's medical adviser. It was in the dry interior of Australia that Mr. Booth regained the robust health that has never since left him.

Now the point of all this is: Mr. Booth was not indebted to the sunnier skies or softer winds of Australia for his cure, but to the fact that constantly, day and night, sleeping or waking, he was breathing a dry air, impregnated with nature's own antiseptics.

A perfectly well man, Mr. Booth has returned to America to carry on a new work, and has brought to it the same intense earnestness that characterized his labor on the platform. Recognizing the futility of trying to reach the germs in the respiratory organs by way of the stomach, or hypodermically by way of the blood, he concentrated all his efforts on a method of inhalation, and PYOMEI, the Australian Dry-Air Treatment of Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Consumption, and all diseases of the respiratory organs, is the result.

His work in the introduction of HYOMEI is meeting with unbounded success. Dr. Morris, of Buffalo, writes on Sept. 4th, 1895:

Dear Sir: In thirty years' experience in the practice of medicine I have never given my name in support of a proprietory remedy, for I never saw one that performed all, and more than was claimed for it, until I met with Hyomei, which I endorse with all my heart (professional ethics to the contrary notwithstanding), for I believe it a duty I owe to humanity. Since testing Hyomei, in Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, Hay Fever, and last, but far from being least, Colloquial Consumption in an advanced stage, which by use of Hyomei, with no other medicine, in four weeks was transformed into an assured recovery, I believe in it for itself, for what it has done.

159 Franklin St., Buffalo, N. Y.

Many people write to Mr. Booth asking, "what is HYOMEI, anyway?" To these we would say: It is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause diseases of the respiratory organs. It renders the air you inhale of the same degree of purity as that found on a mountain 5,000 feet above the sea level, where grow certain trees and plants which help in making the air purer by giving off volatile, antiseptic odors and vapors that are both fragrant and healing.

The air, thoroughly charged with HYOMEI, inhaled through the pocket inhaler at the mouth, after permeating the minutest air cells, is slowly exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It instantly stops all spasmodic coughing, clears the voice, expands the lungs, and increases the breathing capacity.

Mr. Booth has opened an institute at 18 East 20th St., New York, where he will be glad to see all persons afflicted, or he will send the pocket inhaler outfit, complete, by mail, for $1.00, this outfit, consisting of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, beautifully polished, a bottle of HYOMEI, a dropper, and full directions for using.

326 WEST 33D ST., NEW YORK, Sept. 4, 1895.
Mr. R. T. Booth,

Dear Sir: After using HYOMEI for several months, and observing its effects upon many others, I wish to give my testimony as to its merits. I have seen it used in cases of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchial affection, with wonderful relief, where other remedies had failed. In each case it gave promise of a speedy and permanent cure. Personally, I may add, it has been of great service to me, giving clearness and elasticity to my voice in speaking and singing. Yours cordially,

REV. PETER STRYKER, D.D.
President General Synod Reformed Church.
President Stryker Seminary.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., February 8, 1895.

The pocket inhaler works like a charm. The first inhalation gave relief. It is a blessing to humanity, and I am sorry it is not better known. I shall name to the "Pass-it-on-Society." Sincerely yours,

REV. J. M. FARRAR.

Mr. Booth has similar letters by the hundred. They have come unsolicited; they have come from the spontaneous gratitude of those benefited and cured. We respectfully call attention to the testimonials of well-known living men and women. If you are open to conviction write to R. T. Booth, 18 East 20th St., New York, for a pocket inhaler outfit, or for an explanatory pamphlet.

It happens ..ame Sargon is never mentioned ..ient historians, and is, therefore, ..known outside the sacred Script..Even in the Bible he is not mention..the Books of Kings and Chronicles. ..e names of the other Assyrian ..s noticed. This verse in Isaiah, then, ..only place in all history, whether sa..profane, where the word Sargon ..s. Even there it is referred to only ..ingually. This being so, it was ..ible to a weak faith to give up the ..a of Sargon as a distinct individ..and to consider the name as an..designation of some one of the As..syrian rulers who are otherwise known. It need be no cause for wonder that it was so with the ordinary rank and file of the writers of secular history, who seldom show much deference to the authority of the Bible; but it is a surprise to find that not a single commentator of Scripture had sufficient confidence in the literal accuracy of the Word of God to accept this merely incidental allusion as a guarantee for the existence of a King of Nineveh who bore the name of Sargon, as against the silence of all history. Yet such was really the case. Orthodox and conservative interpreters like Matthew Henry, Thomas Scott, and Adam Clarke—names deservedly held in high esteem in the Christian community—all agreed in yielding up this point, and differed only in deciding whether Sargon was another name for Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, or Esarhaddon. How does the question look now in the fresh light which the monuments have thrown on the past? The result has been a triumphant vindication of the literal accuracy of the Sacred narrative, even in the casual and passing allusion that had been made by the prophet. Sargon was neither Sennacherib nor Esarhaddon, but was the father of the former and the grandfather of the latter. The first palace which was discovered in the search among the ruins of Nineveh had been built by Sargon. Copious annals of his reign, extending over fifteen years, have also been found. He is proved to have waged successful wars against all his neighbors, as also to have enlarged and embellished the royal city of Nineveh. So much is certain, that scepticism has got a fresh enemy to fight, and one which is not to be overcome by specious theories of New Theology and Higher Criticism.

ONLY A STEP.

ONLY a step removed
And that step—into bliss;
Our own, our dearly loved,
Whom here on earth we miss.

Not stranded in the dark,
But veiled by purest light;
Each safely anchored bark
Now hidden from our sight.

Not hushed the pleasant song
That used to greet our ear,
But 'mid the Angel throng
Sounding more sweet and clear.

Not passed away the love
So rich, so true, so pure,
But perfected above,
And ever to endure.

Only a step removed.
We soon again shall meet
Our own, our dearly loved,
Around the Saviour's feet.

The Deluge in History.

Traditions Concerning it Preserved by all the Older Nations—Anti-Diluvian Civilization.

IN a recently published pamphlet in "The Historical Deluge," Sir J. William Dawson gives this interesting passage:

It has long been known that traditions of a deluge exist among most of the old civilized nations of Europe and Asia, and similar traditions have been found in America, more especially among the more civilized peoples of the South. Every tribe naturally refers the cataclysm to its own locality, but this is merely an evidence of the antiquity and originality of the story. Even unwritten traditions of this kind, though perhaps mixed with much that is childish and fabulous, must not be despised, for oral tradition, if fixed in a definite form of words, or connected with known natural objects or any recurring festival or ceremony, becomes, like fossil footprints, imperishable.

The greatest amount of attention has, however, been fived on the deluge narratives of Chaldea, as being the oldest, and those pertaining to the oldest abodes of civilized man. They were at first known through the fragments preserved to us of the Chaldean history of Borosus; but the discoveries made by Layard and others of records inscribed in clay tablets in the ruins of the library or archive-chamber of Assurbani-pal, king of Assyria, have not only shown that Berosus founded his history of the event on ancient documents, but have given us many details not otherwise accessible. The tablets of Assur-bani-pal are of comparatively late date, as he was a contemporary of the kings of Judah, but they purport to have been copies from ancient records preserved in Chaldean temples, and representing the earliest history of a people who possessed letters before the age of Abraham.

These records, the now celebrated Chaldean tablets, are in European museums, and have been translated by the late George Smith and others, so that they now constitute one of the oldest known portions of primeval literature. The Chaldean account is apparently connected with the history of an ancient hero-hunter whose name has been read Gisdubar, and who is known to be identical in date, character and actions, with the Biblical Nimrod. This post-diluvial hero is reported to have sought an interview with Hasisadra, the Chaldean Noah, who was believed, as an immortal and deified man, to have his abode at the mouth of the Euphrates and its confluent streams, as if set to watch that the waters of the great deep should not return to overflow the land. The translated and glorified patriarch is made to relate in poetical and imaginative guise his own experiences in the great flood. We thus have a poetical version of the deluge narrative prepared by a very ancient author, who probably had access to original documents now lost to us. He weaves this into a complex mythological form, containing the different gods of the Chaldean pantheon as actors in the drama, just as Homer brings in the gods of Olympus in the "Iliad." Of course the comparison of such a production with the plain prosaic statements of Genesis cannot yield any very certain result. There are, however, such coincidences as compel us to believe that the authors of Genesis and of the Chaldean poem have had access to the same facts.

On the other hand, the differences are sufficient to show that the one cannot be copied from the other, and the balance of probability is altogether in favor of the Biblical account being the older and more accurate of the two. The account in Genesis is, as we have already seen, a plain narrative of the nature of contemporary annals, while the Chaldean story introduces many imaginary deities, and expands the story by a number of accessory matters, having the aspect of additions to increase the attractiveness and 'sensational' character of the story, or to adapt it for liturgical use in temple services. The agreements relate to matters of fact, capable of being ascertained by observation. The differences consist in fanciful and mythological additions to the Chaldean version. In both records the moral element is the same—Divine wrath against the sins of men. In both, the means of deliverance for the godly family is an ark or ship, built under Divine direction, and coated with bitumen; in both, animals are preserved as well as men; in both the physical agencies appear the same; in both, the patriarch uses birds as his messengers. These features cannot be accidental resemblances; but the accessories of pilot and mariners, the addition of the swallow to the birds, and the complex machinery of gods and goddesses in the Chaldean version, must be attributed to the imagination of the poet, whose work we have a right to assume is founded on facts derived from a document similar to that which we have in Genesis.

Another line of historic parallelism, in my judgment quite as important, is that which relates to the state of civilization of the antediluvians and the survivors of the deluge. I have already shown that in this Genesis is consistent with itself. Even in postdiluvian times it would be absurd to infer from a description of the arts of ancient Chaldea and Egypt that a similar advancement of social life must have existed in Northern and Western Europe.

The evidence now before us that Europe was at the time inhabited by barbarous tribes does not invalidate either the Chaldean statements or those of Genesis. But the evidence of old Chaldean monuments, extending almost as far back as the deluge, gives us positive confirmation of these statements, since it shows that at a period much too early to allow of the rise of civilization, the Akkadians and their confreres in Chaldea were erecting magnificent temples and temple towers, were practising the arts of metallurgy, pottery, sculpture, agriculture, and navigation, in a manner scarcely if at all inferior to that of their successors in later historic periods. In point of fact, the early civilizations of Chaldea, Egypt, and Phœnicia are inexplicable, except on the supposition that the survivors of the great deluge were civilized men.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Spring No. 2. In Rheumatic Gout, Paralysis, &c

Case of Dr. J. A. Hanby, of Patrick C. H., Va., stated by himself.

"For four years I was afflicted with Rheumatic Gout to an extent which capacitated me entirely from the discharge of the duties of my profession, and w finally reduced to such a condition as to subject me for the most part in confinemen to my bed. By the advice of one of my medical attendants, and emphatically as dernier ressort, I determined to make use of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, am frank to sa without faith in its virtues, having but little confidence in mineral waters. The u however, of a few cases of the water was attended by beneficial results so remarkab that I was soon able to be out of bed and upon my feet, and my improvement has co tinued until I am now actively engaged in the practice of my profession, meetin without any unusual inconvenience, all the exposure and hardship incidental to t life of a physician in a mountain country. I cannot, in candor, do otherwise than c cribe my recovery solely to this water, the value of which I regard as beyond estimation

Dr. James Beale, Richmond, Va., Member of the Medical Society of V.

"In my own family the use of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, has e ercised the most be eficial influences. Mrs. Beale commenced the use of this water after a confineme of eighteen months to her room from attacks of Rheumatic Gout, which had broug on a paralysis of the lower extremities and of her right hand. Latterly, this co dition of things was succeeded by dropsical effusion in both limbs, rendering lo motion impracticable without assistance. Since using the water, which she has do for several months at home, the Dropsical Effusion had disappeared. She walks wi out assistance and writes legibly, previously having been compelled to employ amanuensis. I have witnessed other remarkable results from the action of t water in Gouty affections, and in this malady I regard it as invaluable."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gall bottles $5.00 f.o.b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

JEWS RETURNING TO PALESTINE.

Dr. Dunning, who recently conducted a large party of pilgrims through Palestine, gives some interesting facts concerning its growth in population: The present population of the territory, anciently known as Palestine, is estimated at 650,000. The present number of "The Journal" of the German Palestine Society gives the Jews in that country as 43,783. It is probable that they now number about 50,000. Nearly two-thirds of these are in and around Jerusalem, and most of the remainder are in twelve other cities. Safed has 6,120 in population of 19,120, and Jaffa 2,500 in a population of 10,000. About 3,000 are in seven-eight agricultural colonies. The city Salonica alone—the ancient Thessalonica on the coast of Macedonia, contains more than one and a-half times as many Jews as the whole of Palestine. The Jewish population in Palestine has increased considerably within the last ten years, in spite of the opposition of the Turkish Government. The larger part of these immigrants have been assisted to get to Palestine, and supported since their arrival by contributions from without.

ATROCITIES IN AFRICA.

Startling charges of brutality are brought against the officials of the Congo Free State. It is alleged that in their eager desire for ivory and palm oil these State officials have compelled the natives to supply certain quantities of these products within a given time by threats of terrible punishment, and that the indiscretion of injuring india-rubber plants is visited with inhuman penalties, that baskets filled with human hands are taken on account of these and other deeds and misdemeanors have been seen here and there in the Congo; that these functionaries hold the lives of the natives of little account, it being no uncommon thing to see the natives up as targets for their rifles. Gross immorality is also charged. Finally, the missionaries are indignant over the state of affairs. It would not be surprising, if the Belgian Government, when fully informed of these matters, should insist on sweeping changes in the administration of Congo affairs.

BAKE A BATCH OF BISCUITS

Sift one quart of flour, two rounding teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and one teaspoonful of salt into a bowl; add three teaspoonfuls of COTTOLENE and rub together until thoroughly mixed; then add sufficient milk to make a soft dough; knead slightly, roll out about half an inch thick, and cut with a small biscuit cutter. Place a little apart in a greased pan, and bake in a quick oven for fifteen or twenty minutes. These biscuits should be a delicate brown top and bottom, light on the sides, and snowy white when broken open.

The secret of success in this recipe, as in others, is to use but two-thirds as much Cottolene as you used to use of lard. Cottolene will make the biscuit light, delicious, wholesome. Better than any biscuit you ever made before. Try it. Be sure and get genuine Cottolene. Sold everywhere in tins with trade-marks —"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

AFTER THE MARTYRDOM.

The Chinese Viceroy Degraded at the Demand of the English Ambassador at Pekin —The Burial of the Martyred Missionaries at Foo-Chow.

FRIENDS of missions, the world over, rejoice that the inquiry into the outrages

SIR NICHOLAS O'CONOR.
British Ambassador to the Chinese Court.

China has not ended ineffectively. There is, for some time, reason to fear that it would result in the payment of a money indemnity and the execution of a number of officers and low-class people, both ignore. The declaration would have been no discouraging, some future would succeeded and would influence these officials and the missionaries must be protected. And if officials do their duty to protect and maintain the treaty they solemnly signed. The commission of outrages appears to have reached the climax in the massacre of the missionaries at Kucheng, the capital of the Province in which the outrages took place. Accordingly, Sir Nicholas O'Conor, the British Ambassador to China, was instructed to present a formal demand to the Chinese Goverment for the degradation of Liu Ping Chang, Viceroy of the Province of Sze-Chuen. Knowing the dilatory and sinuous policy of China in its diplomacy, he was instructed to notify the Government that if his demand was not complied with within two weeks, the British Admiral in Chinese waters would take action. As the Admiral had some fourteen powerful vessels at his disposal in the vicinity of Nankin, the threat was not an idle one. The Chinese Government yielded promptly. Within forty-eight hours a proclamation was issued stripping the Viceroy of all his honors and declaring him unworthy to hold office in future. That no mistake might be made, the proclamation stated that the punishment was inflicted for his failure to protect foreigners. As Liu Ping Chang is enormously rich and has powerful friends at court, his punishment should be a wholesome lesson to other officials. It may be hoped that they will learn from it that neither wealth nor influence can shield them if they do not do their duty. Had he escaped punishment, there would have been no security for the lives of other missionaries in the interior provinces.

COTTAGES AT HWASANG, WHERE THE MISSIONARIES WERE KILLED.

On this page are pictures that will have a melancholy interest for every Christian. One is taken from a photograph of the grave at Foo-chow, in which the mangled remains of the martyred missionaries were reverently laid. The recovery of their bodies, as well as the timely surgical help rendered to the survivors was due to the prompt action of Dr. Gregory, supported by the energetic action of Mr. Hixson, American Consul, whose kindness and sympathy were of the utmost value. The victims were English, but the English consul was apathetic, and Mr. Hixson in the interest of humanity used his influence to secure Dr. Gregory, the protection he needed in going to the scene of the outrages. The smaller pictures are from photographs of the cottages at Hwasang, where the massacre took place. No. 1 is the house where Rev. Mr. Phillips was lodging at the time of the murders and from which he providentially escaped. No. 2 shows the cottages that were attacked. That in the foreground was occupied by the ladies of the Zenana Mission and that in the background was the one in which Mr. Stewart and his family were staying. It was burned after its inmates were murdered and only the charred remains of their bodies were recovered.

THE BURIAL OF THE MARTYRS OF KUCHENG.

The bodies were placed in coffins by Dr. Gregory, and were carried to Foo-Chow for interment.

ISAAC RESCUED.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Genesis 22: 7, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?"

HERE are Abraham and Isaac: the one a kind, old, gracious, affectionate father; the other a brave, obedient, religious son. From his bronzed appearance you can tell that this son has been much in the fields, and from his shaggy dress you know that he has been watching the herds. The mountain air has painted his cheek rubicund. He is twenty, or twenty-five, or, as some suppose, thirty-three years of age; nevertheless a boy, considering the length of life to which people lived in those times, and the fact that a son never is anything but a boy to a father. I remember that my father used to come into the house when the children were home on some festal occasion, and say: "Where are the boys?" although "the boys" were twenty-five, and and thirty, and thirty-five years of age. So this Isaac is only a boy to Abraham, and this father's heart is in him. It is Isaac here and Isaac there. If there is any festivity around the father's tent, Isaac must enjoy it. It is Isaac's walk, and Isaac's apparel, and Isaac's manners, and Isaac's prospects, and Isaac's prosperity. The father's heart-strings are all wrapped around that boy, and wrapped again, until nine-tenths of the old man's life is in Isaac. I can just imagine how lovingly and proudly he looked at his only son.

Well, the dear old man had borne a great deal of trouble, and it had left its mark upon him. In hieroglyphics of wrinkle the story was written from forehead to chin. But now his trouble seems all gone, and we are glad that he is very soon to rest forever. If the old man shall get decrepit, Isaac is strong enough to wait on him. If the father get dim of eyesight, Isaac will lead him by the hand. If the father become destitute, Isaac will earn him bread. How glad we are that the ship that has been in such a stormy sea, is coming at last into the harbor. Are you not rejoiced that glorious old Abraham is through with his troubles? No! no! A thunderbolt! From that clear eastern sky there drops into that father's tent a voice with an announcement enough to turn black hair white, and to stun the patriarch into instant annihilation. God said: "Abraham!" The old man answered: "Here I am." God said to him: "Take thy son, thy only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt-offering." In other words, slay him; cut his body into fragments; put the fragments on the wood; set fire to the wood, and let Isaac's body be consumed.

"Cannibalism! Murder!" says some one. "Not so," said Abraham. I hear him soliloquize: "Here is the boy on whom I have depended! Oh, how I loved him! He was given in answer to prayer, and now must I surrender him? O Isaac, my son! Isaac, how shall I part with you? But then it is always safer to do as God asks me to; I have been in dark places before, and God got me out. I will implicitly do as God has told me, although it is very dark. I can't see my way, but I know God makes no mistakes, and to him I commit myself and my darling son."

Early in the morning there is a stir around Abraham's tent. A beast of burden is fed and saddled. Abraham makes no disclosure of the awful secret. At the break of day he says: "Come, come, Isaac, get up! We are going off on a two or three days' journey." I hear the axe hewing and splitting amid the wood until the sticks are made the right length and the right thickness, and then they are fastened on the beast of burden. They pass on—there are four of them—Abraham, the father; Isaac, the son; and two servants. Going along the road, I see Isaac looking up into his father's face, and saying: "Father, what is the matter? Are you not well! Has anything happened? Are you tired? Lean on my arm." Then, turning around to the servants, the son says: "Ah! father is getting old, and he has had trouble enough in other days to kill him."

The third morning has come, and it is the day of the tragedy. The two servants are left with the beast of burden, while Abraham and his son Isaac, as was the custom of good people in those times, went up on the hill to sacrifice to the Lord. The wood is taken off the beast's back, and put on Isaac's back. Abraham has in one hand a pan of coals or a lamp, and in the other a sharp, keen knife. Here are all the appliances for sacrifice, you say. No, there is one thing wanting; there is no victim—no pigeon, or heifer, or lamb. Isaac, not knowing that he is to be the victim, looks up into his father's face, and asks a question which must have cut the old man to the bone: "My father!" The father said: "My son, Isaac, here I am." The son said: "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" The father's lip quivered, and his heart fainted, and his knees knocked together, and his entire body, mind, and soul shivered in sickening anguish as he struggles to gain equipoise; for he does not want to break down. And then he looks into his son's face, with a thousand rushing tendernesses, and says: "My son, God will provide himself a lamb."

The twain are now at the foot of the hill, the place which is to be famous for a most transcendent occurrence. They gather some stones out of the field, and build an altar of three or four feet high. Then they take this wood off Isaac's back and sprinkle it over the stones, so as to help and invite the flame. The altar is done—it is all done. Isaac has helped to build it. With his father he has discussed whether the top of the table is even, and whether the wood is properly prepared. Then there is a pause. The son looks around to see if there is not some living animal that can be caught and butchered for the offering. Abraham tries to choke down his fatherly feelings and suppress his grief, in order that he may break to his son the terrific news that he is to be the victim.

Ah! Isaac never looked more beautiful than on that day to his father. As the old man ran his emaciated fingers through his son's hair, he said to himself: "How shall I give him up? What will his mother say when I come back without my boy? I thought he would have been the comfort of my declining days. I thought he would have been the hope of ages to come. Beautiful and loving, and yet to die under my own hand. Oh, God! is there not some other sacrifice that will do? Take my life, and spare his! Pour out my blood, and save Isaac for his mother and the world!" But this was an inward struggle. The father controls his feelings, and looks into his son's face, and says: "Isaac, must I tell you all?" His son said: "Yes, father. I thought you had something on your mind; tell it." The father said: "My son, Isaac, thou art the lamb!" "Oh," you say, "why didn't that young man, if he was twenty or thirty years of age, smite into the dust his infirm father? He could have done it." Ah! Isaac knew by this time that the scene was typical of a Messiah who was to come, and so he made no struggle. They fell on each other's necks, and wailed out the parting. Awful and matchless scene of the wilderness. The rocks echo back the breaking of their hearts. The cry: "My son! my son!" The answer: "My father! my father!"

Do not compare this, as some people have, to Agamemnon, willing to offer up his daughter, Iphigenia, to please the gods. There is nothing comparable to this wonderful obedience to the true God. You know that victims for sacrifice were always bound, so that they might not struggle away. Rawlings, the martyr, when he was dying for Christ's sake, said to the blacksmith who held the manacles: "Fasten those chains tight now, for my flesh may struggle mightily." So Isaac's arms are fastened, his feet are tied. The old man, rallying all his strength, lifts him on to a pile of wood. Fastening a thong on one side of the altar, he makes it span the body of Isaac, and fastens the thong at the other side the altar, and another thong, and another thong. There is the lamp flickering in the wind, ready to be put under the brush-wood of the altar. There is the knife, sharp and keen. Abraham—struggling with his mortal feelings on the one side, and the commands of God on the other—takes that knife, rubs the flat of it on the palm of his hand, cries to God for help, comes up to the side of the altar, puts a parting kiss on the brow of his boy, takes a message from him for mother and home, and then, lifting the glittering weapon for the plunge of the death-stroke—his muscles knitting for the work—the hand begins to descend. It falls! Not on the heart of Isaac, but on the arm of God, who arrests the stroke, making the wilderness quake with the cry: "Abraham! Abraham! lay not thy hand upon the lad, nor do him any harm!"

What is this sound back in the woods! It is a crackling as of tree branches, a bleating and a struggle. Go, Abraham, and see what it is. Oh, it was a ram that, going through the woods, has its crooked horns fastened and entangled in the brushwood, and could not get loose; and Abraham seizes it gladly, and quickly unloosens Isaac from the altar, puts the ram on in his place, sets the lamp under the brushwood of the altar, and as the dense smoke of the sacrifice begins to rise, the blood rolls down the sides of the altar, and drops hissing into the fire, and I hear the words: "Behold the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world."

Well, what are you going to get out of this? There is an aged minister of the Gospel. He says: "I should get out of it that when God tells you to do a thing, whether it seems reasonable to you or not, go ahead and do it. Here Abraham couldn't have been mistaken. God didn't speak so indistinctly that it was not certain whether he called Sarah, or Abimelech, or somebody else; but with divine articulation, divine intonation, divine emphasis, he said: 'Abraham!' Abraham rushed blindly ahead to do his duty, knowing that things would come out right. Likewise do so yourselves. There is a mystery of your life. There is some burden you have to carry. You don't know why God has put it on you. There is some persecution, some trial, and you don't know why God allows it. There is a work for you to do, and you have not enough grace, you think, to do it. I as Abraham did. Advance, and do your ole duty. Be willing to give up Isaac, an er- haps you will not have to give up anyt ng. 'Jehovah-jireh'—the Lord will pro s. A capital lesson this old minister giv us.

Out yonder, in this house, is an ged woman; the light of heaven in her e; she is half-way through the door she has her hand on the pearl of the ate. Mother, what would you get out o as subject? "Oh," she says, "I would m that it is in the last pinch that God nes to the relief. You see the altar was t. and Isaac was fastened on it. an me knife was lifted; and just at the la ment God broke in and stopped pr ed- ings. So it has been in my life of se re years. Why, sir, there was a time e the flour was all out of the house; d set the table at noon and had noth t put on it; but five minutes of one o'c g loaf of bread came. The Lord will pr de My son was very sick, and I said: ea Lord, you don't mean to take him a from me, do you? Please, Lord, don ve him away. Why, there are neighbo rs have three and four sons; this is m y son; this is my Isaac. Lord, you take him away from me, will But I saw he was getting worse and re all the time; and I turned round and a ed, until after awhile I felt submissiv and I could say: 'Thy will, O Lord, be d The doctors gave him up, and we al ve him up. And, as was the custom ir e times, we had made the grave-clothe s we were whispering about the last ex se when I looked, and I saw some persp ra on his brow, showing that the fev ra broken, and he spoke to us so nat that I knew he was going to get wel He did get well, and my son Isaac, w n thought was going to be slain and co re- ed of disease, was loosened from tha ta And bless your souls, that's been seventy years; and if my voice w s so weak, and if I could see better, I preach to you younger people a se on for though I can't see much, I can se ds whenever you get into a tough pla ce and your heart is breaking, if you will a little farther into the woods, you w see caught in the branches, a substitute J r deliverance. 'My son, God will p vide himself a lamb.'"

Thank you, mother, for that she se mon. I could preach back to you for ni ute or two and say, never do you f wish I had half as good a hope of i ven as you have Do not fear, mother; hat ever happens, no harm will ever ha n to you. I was going up a long flight of ps and I saw an aged woman, very de repit, and with a cane, creeping on up. Sh ace but very little progress, and I felt v ex uberant; and I said to her: "Why er, that is no way to go up-stairs;" I threw my arms around her and I ne her up and put her down on the lan g the top of the stairs. She said: " you, thank you; I am very thankf mother, when you get through thi life's work and you want to go up-sta and rest in the good place that G has provided for you, you will not have t up—you will not have to crawl u painfully. The two arms that were st ched on the Cross will be flung around y and you will be hoisted with a glorious t be- yond all weariness and all struggle. May the God of Abraham and Isaac be w you until you see the Lamb on the hill-to

Now, that aged minister has ade a suggestion, and this aged woman ha made a suggestion; I will make a sugg on: Isaac going up the hill makes me th the great sacrifice. Isaac, the only s of Abraham. Jesus, the only Son o God. On those two "onlys" I build a tear em- phasis. O Isaac! O Jesus! B this last sacrifice was a more tremendo one. When the knife was lifted over C rary, there was no voice that cried "Stop and no hand arrested it. Sharp, keen, and ous, it cut down through nerve and tery until the blood sprayed the faces of e ex- ecutioners, and the mid-day sun dr ed a v of cloud over its face because it could n endure the spectacle. O Isaac, of Mount Moriah! O Jesus, of Mount Calvary! Better could God have thrown a by into annihilation a thousand worlds, th to have sacrificed his only Son. It was n one of ten sons—it was his only Son. If he had not given up him, you and I wld have perished. "God so loved the wld that he gave his only—" I stop th e, not because I have forgotten the q tation, but because I want to think. "od so loved the world that he gave his o begotten Son, that whosoever be lieth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Great God! break my h rt at the thought of that sacrifice. Isaac th only, typical of Jesus the Only.

ou see Isaac going up the hill and carr g the wood. O Abraham, why not t the load off the boy? If he is going to die so soon, why not make his last hours ea ? Abraham knew that in carrying th wood up Mount Moriah, Isaac was to be symbol of Christ carrying his own cr s up Calvary. I do not know how h y that cross was—whether it was m le of oak, or acacia, or Lebanon cedar. I pose it may have weighed one, or two, or hree hundred pounds. That was the li test part of the burden. All the sins and s ows of the world were wound around th cross. The heft of one, the heft of tw worlds: earth and hell were on his shoulders. O Isaac, carrying the w d of sacrifice up Mount Moriah. Jesus carrying the wood of sacrifice up Mount Calvary, the agonies of earth and hell wrapped around th cross. I shall never see the h y load on Isaac's back, that I shall not think of the crushing load on Christ's back. For whom that lo ? For you. For you. For me. F me. Would that all the tears th we have ever wept over our s ows had been saved until this m ning, and that we might now p them out on the lacerated back an feet and heart of the Son of G .

ou say: "If this young man was twnty or thirty years of age did n he resist? Why was it not Is c binding Abraham instead of A aham binding Isaac? The musc n Isaac's arm was stronger than th muscle in Abraham's withered ar . No young man twenty-five ye s of age would submit to have hi father fasten him to a pile of wd with intention of burnin" Isaac was a willing sacrifice, and sc type of Christ who willingly came to se the world. If all the armies of heaven ad resolved to force Christ out from th gate, they could not have done it. Christ was equal with God. If all the battalions of glory had armed themselves and relved to put Christ forth and make him co e out and save this world, they could n have succeeded in it. With one stroke he would have toppled over angelic and an angelic dominion.

ut there was one thing that the omnipotent Christ could not stand. Our sorrows mastered him. He could not bear to se the world die without an offer of pard and help, and if all heaven had armed itself to keep him back, if the gates of life h been bolted and double-barred, Christ wld have flung the everlasting doors fr n their hinges, and would have sprung fo h, scattering the hindering hosts of heaven like chaff before the whirlwind, as he cid: "Lo! I come to suffer. Lo! I come to die." Christ—a willing sacrifice. Willing to take Bethlehem humiliation, and Sanhedrim outrage, and whipping-post maltreatment, and Golgotha butchery. Willing to be bound. Willing to suffer. Willing to die. Willing to save.

ow does this affect you? Do not your very best impulses bound out toward this pity-struck Christ? Get down at his feet, O ye people. Put your lips against the wind on his right foot and help kiss away the pang. Wipe the foam from his dying lip. Get under the cross until you feel the baptism of his rushing tears. Take him into your heart, with warmest love and undying enthusiasm. By your resistances you have abused him long enough. Christ is willing to save you. Are you willing to be saved? It seems to me as if this moment were throbbing with the invitations of an all-compassionate God.

I have been told that the cathedral of St. Mark's stands in a quarter in the centre of the city of Venice, and that when the clock strikes twelve at noon, all the birds from the city and the regions round about the city fly to the square and settle down. It came in this wise: a large-hearted woman passing one noonday across the square, saw some birds shivering in the cold, and she scattered some crumbs of bread among them. The next day, at the same hour, she scattered more crumbs of bread among them, and so on from year to year until the day of her death. In her will she bequeathed a certain amount of money to keep up the same practice, and now, at the first stroke of the bell at noon, the birds begin to come there, and when the clock has struck twelve, the square is covered with them. How beautifully suggestive. Christ comes out to feed thy soul to-day. The more hungry you feel yourselves to be, the better it is. It is noon and the Gospel clock strikes twelve. Come in flocks! Come as doves to the window! All the air is filled with the liquid chime: Come! Come! Come!

GOSPEL WAGON OF THE SYRACUSE RESCUE MISSION.

BUILDING HIGHER.

In an address, not long ago, Mr. Moody, the evangelist told this beautiful story of a "Shut-in." Week after week, she lay wearily upon her couch, watching a little bird that used to perch outside her window and sing. After awhile she saw it busily building its nest; but it built upon a low branch where evil would surely reach it. The lady said she would watch the work with sadness, for she could foresee the ruin which must follow: and she would lean out and whisper, "Build higher, little bird, build higher." But the bird did not heed the loving cry, and still continued to build its home so very near to earth; and it was not long before mother bird was cooing over her tiny nestlings, and the proud young father sang of his happiness to all the world around. How glad the little family! How secure they felt! One morning, as the lady looked out for her dainty friends, she saw only a few stray feathers mixed with bits of earth and straw. A cat had destroyed the nest and its inmates. How kind it would have been in the watcher who knew the ruin that must surely come, if, as the bird tried to build, she had put forth her hand and destroyed every vestige of the nest; then the discouraged birds would have built on higher grounds. We often wonder why our heavenly Father allows some hope to be so rudely crushed; some dream to know such sad awakenings.

Godless Hop-Pickers.

The Syracuse Rescue Mission's Work in the Hop-fields of Central New York.

EVERY year, the Rescue Mission of Syracuse, N. Y., makes an evangelistic trip in its Gospel wagon through Madison and Oneida counties, where thousands gather from the cities of Central New York to harvest the hop crop. The worst elements from the cities, besides thousands of tramps from all over the country, gather there each year, and while the days are spent in picking the hops, in many places the nights are spent in riotous living. The saloon reaps a rich harvest. Almost every night a "hop-dig" or dance is given in some hotel or hop-barn, and the men and women gather from the surrounding farms for a night of fun. The spirituality of this section is at low ebb, some of the villages not having a single male church member, and many places not having over two of three; yet most of these villages support several saloons.

Many of the hop-growers lament the iniquity that abounds and employ only home pickers, those from the neighborhood. Some who go from the cities are respectable people, but many go just to have a time of unrestrained sinful pleasure. The mission party this year was divided into two sections, Mr. Smith Allen and Geo. Haight going direct to the centre of the district and confining their labors to that section. The others, Rev. E. P. Marvin, Mr. Robert Fulton, Mr. J. E. Hendley and H. B. Gibbud, the Superintendent of the mission, traveled about two hundred miles through that region, in the mission's new wagon, "Rescue Messenger." It was designed for this line of work by Mr. Gibbud. The workers, four in number, can sleep in it and during the time they were out did their own cooking, etc. The wagon is drawn by one horse, being built light for that purpose. Canned goods are stored in a neat drawer under the wagon and the seats are made so as to swing out and form a berth wide enough for three to sleep abreast, and also room for one underneath on the floor of the wagon. It is brightly painted and lettered and attracted much attention whenever it appeared. It is intended to be used in the home work of the mission during the week nights, as they have a large wagon, seating forty persons for the Sunday meeting. The small wagon will also be used for evangelistic trips through the neighboring counties.

Meetings were held by the workers principally in the streets of the villages at eventide. Several times meetings were held in the churches; also in hop-barns, hop-yards by the way-side, in saloons, and the dance halls. Sixty-three meetings were held altogether, and the attendance was 9224. There were 270 requests for prayer, and 46 professed conversion. The trip lasted nearly a month, much good was accomplished, and souls were saved. The workers were enabled to rebuke sin and to preach the Gospel to many who would never hear it in any other way. The work had a quieting effect, the meetings were always well attended, and the best of attention given, though frequently there would be three or four intoxicated persons in the open-air meetings. In the work in the fields, the workers were chaffed at and jeered unmercifully; it was a rough trip in many ways, but the results more than paid for the efforts put forth. Let Christian workers everywhere take advantage of crowds that gather, no matter what the occasion, to preach the Gospel by open-air work, tract distribution, and personal conversation.

TRAVELING IN THE DESERT.

At different times, within the last twenty years, various schemes have been projected with a view to facilitating travel across the great Nubian desert in Upper Egypt. Nothing better has yet been devised, however, than the camel corps, an illustration of which is shown on this page. The artist has represented a detachment of the corps starting on a twelve days' march through the desert from Wadi Halfeh to Korusko. The march was accomplished satisfactorily in ten days.

Although it will doubtless be long before steam transportation is attempted in any of the great deserts, other parts of the world, hitherto almost sealed to exploration and commerce, are being opened up by the construction of many railways, Africa is gradually being penetrated by rail, and the next few years will see many new projects started for railroad-building. The railway from Mombasa to Uganda is progressing favorably. The first one hundred and forty miles from Mombasa to Tzavo traverses the Taro Desert, one of the great drawbacks to a journey to Uganda in the dry season, sixty miles of waterless desert having to be covered. From Tzavo for another fifty miles to Kibwesi is the "tsetse-fly" belt. There is on this part of the route an industrial mission founded by Sir William Mackinnon. At a point forty miles beyond Kibwesi the line branches off to the left of the caravan route, avoiding the station of Machako, and not rejoining the road until near Kikuyu, thus avoiding some very rough and difficult country which caravans have to encounter. Here the line runs over rolling prairie. After it rejoins the caravan route near Kikuyu, there is a sharp rise in the ground of 600 feet in a section of ten miles. All this district is 6,000 feet to 7,000 feet above sea-level, and is very healthy. From this point the railway enters prairie and grass-land covered with game, but practically uninhabited. At one point there is a rise of 1,000 feet through the dense Subuyu forest. Emerging from the forest at about one hundred and fifty miles from the Victoria Nyanza, the traveler meets rapidly undulating grass-land to the borders of Kavirondo—a thickly populated and highly cultivated country not very easy to traverse. From that point the line runs to the terminus at Berkeley Bay, forty miles distant, on the northeast shore of the lake, over an easy country. It is intended that the train shall take eight days to do the journey.

BOWERY MISSION PATRONS.

THE following persons have sent in their names for enrollment as Patrons of the Bowery Mission during the past week:

Mrs. C. A. Osborne.
Miss S. M. Osborne.
Mrs. Adeline Williams.
A family being led by Jesus.
Friend, Kansas.

All desiring to be enrolled on the list of patrons, should send their names and addresses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

THE CHILD SAMUEL.

S. S. Lesson for Oct. 27. I. Sam. 3: 1-13. Golden Text, I. Sam. 3: 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE very name, Samuel, which Hannah gave to her son bears witness to the spirit in which the Old Testament prophetess received, at the Lord's hand, the precious gift of a son for which she had pleaded so earnestly and perseveringly. "Asked of God," or "heard of God," both express the meaning of the name Samuel in Hebrew. Hannah's son was the living witness of her prayer and of God's answer; and she would have everyone know, by the name he bore, that the God of Israel answers prayer. But the burden of Hannah's heart in asking for a son was not selfish. If she had desired only to put an end to Peninnah's provocation, and to the reproach which fell upon herself, in common with all childless women in Israel, Hannah would have gratified her own pride, and indulged the yearning of her mother heart, in keeping her son by her side.

But this woman desired a gift from the Lord only that she too might be in a position to give to him. The God of Israel was more to her than the long desired and prayed for son who was given in answer to her prayers; and in the deep consecration of her spirit she brought her newly weaned child, hardly old enough to speak the name of the mother who so loved him, and she presented him to the Lord for his exclusive service in his temple, where her eyes would see him only once in a year. It was consecration of the deepest kind, and it bore witness to the way in which her bowed spirit had met God, and had submitted to his purifying discipline in her home trials.

Some mothers count it a hard thing for God to ask that they should give up a child or children to go out into distant mission fields. Others, who have never looked upon their children as their own, would count it the greatest privilege if they could ever have the joy of seeing their children called to service or to danger, in the cause of him who is more to them than life, more than husband, wife or child. Obedience in the one case is to yield the children up to God; the severe discipline in the other is the deep humiliation that children long prayed over, and fully given to the Lord, have themselves either no desire or no fitness for this high and blessed service.

Hannah Knew God

and she knew how to trust to him all the consequences of obeying him. To offer her son for the temple service meant to place him in the atmosphere of the impious and immoral sons of Eli. The risk was, humanly speaking, terrible. But Hannah's dealings with God when she asked a son, and when she trusted her God and sought no sympathy from man in her bitter home sorrows, had prepared her to trust her son to the keeping power of him that keepeth Israel, and that "neither slumbereth nor sleepeth." (Ps. 121: 4). She was willing to trust that God, even in the surroundings of Hophni and Phinehas could do more for her Samuel than all her influence as a mother could have done at home. It was a walk of faith, and God justified her in it.

Thus Samuel grew up with comparatively [illegible] knew something of the terms on which that mother lived with her God. He became an obedient child to the now aged high priest, Eli, and was occupied in the care of the tabernacle. Samuel did not yet know the Lord, neither was the Word of the Lord yet revealed to him. He knew his mother, he knew Eli, he knew his father Elkanah, but he and God had never met face to face. God cannot be known second hand: even a child must have to do with him, must come in contact with him. No amount of innocence, no amount of moral goodness can stand in the stead of real, face to face intercourse with God.

It was at night—the day's work was over, Eli, whose outward eyes and inward eyes were now failing him, had retired for the night, and little Samuel, as is the custom in the East with servants, had just laid himself down on the ground in the tabernacle, and gone to sleep, when a voice awoke him, and he heard the call distinctly, "Samuel." His firsr instinct was to reply, "Here I am." But as nothing further took place with his wonted obedience the lad arose, ran to Eli, and said, "Here am I, for thou callest me." When the old priest replied: "I called not; lie down again," the prophet elect

Did not Argue but Obeyed.

This characteristic of unquestioning obedience is an imperative necessity for a prophet of the Lord. Abraham could not have become "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4: 11), had he not implicitly obeyed his God. A second time and a third time the Lord called Samuel. The lad did not argue as may a child might have done. "What is the use of my going to Eli? He always says he did not call me, yet I am sure I heard someone call, and there is nobody hear but he; I may as will save myself the trouble, and lie still." No; Samuel did not consider what would be convenient to him, but what was the right thing to do. Samuel's vocation was to minister to Eli; his course was clear; he must do the right thing whether it suited him or not, thus he would serve God, and it was not his business to consider what the result should be. "How can I best serve God?" is a question which is generally easy to answer, if all other considerations are set on one side. A man, woman or child who makes this his business has but one thing to do all the day long: just to please God. Nothing simplifies life like this, "I do always those things which please him," said our Lord. (John 8: 29).

But Eli was awakening to a fact which was deeply, terribly humbling him. "The Word of the Lord was precious." It was an unusual thing now to have any communication from above. The tabernacle service was offered, the sacrifices, the feasts, and the observances of outward worship went on in their usual routine; but an ominous, a meaning silence on God's part shewed his grief and displeasure with the offerings which were made to him, while the very priests who offered them were guilty of flagrant sin against him. And now the voice which had ceased to speak to him was heard again, and the little child who ministered to him was to be promoted as God's messenger, and to be brought in contact with him, while he, the high priest, who should have been nearer to God than any man in Israel, must retire to the back ground! O the awful moment when a true child of God awakes to the fact that he has gone back from following him, and that God has grown distant to him! No heart-rending bereavement, no earthly loss of whatever kind, can cause a grief so poignant as the discovery of a child of God, that he has grieved, wronged, dishonored and alienated his God!

But Eli did not therefore yield to a wrong spirit. It is very touching to notice how the old man prepared the child to take the place which he himself had lost. Perceiving that the Lord had called the child, he instructed him to go and lie down, and if the voice called yet a fourth time, he should say, 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." The child obeyed. And now a change took place. It is not said, "the Lord called," but "the Lord and called as at other times"; it was no longer only a voice but a vision. (ver. 14.) And Samuel said "Speak, for thy servant heareth:" but he did not say Lord. The child trembled to pronounce the name Jehovah. It was the revelation of God to the child, his first conscious definite transaction with him.

It was no light thing to be revealed to a child of tender age that the aged man whom he had learned to obey and reverence, had fallen under God's displeasure because he had not judged and put an end to the sin of his sons, that his whole house or family must fall under judgment.

"HERE AM I."

THE prophet, Samuel, appears to have been born about the year 1146 B.C., but this, like all dates prior to the establishment of the monarchy is uncertain. He is described as an Ephraimite, but if he really belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, he would not be eligible to the priesthood. It is probable that he belonged to the tribe of Levi, but may have been born in Ephraim, as the Levites having no territory assigned to them, were scattered among the tribes. The genealogy in I. Chron. 6 confirms this theory. Samuel occupies a prominent position in the sacred record, both on account of his personal character and of the fact that with him the rule of judges come to an end and the government changed its form to a monarchy. The incident in the lesson occurred, according to Josephus, when he was twelve years old. He was at that time living in the Tabernacle, which, after its long years of desert wandering, was set up permanently at Shiloh, a city midway between Bethel and Shechem and about seventeen miles north of Jerusalem. He had been solemnly devoted to the Tabernacle service by his mother, in fulfilment of a vow made before his birth. She was one of the two wives of a godly man, who appears to have realized in his life the discomforts of polygamy. She had no children, which, to a Hebrew wife was always a reproach, and, smarting under the taunts of the other wife, who had children, she made earnest prayer for a son, pledging herself in the event of her prayer being answered, to give him to God's service. Accordingly, she took him as soon as he was old enough to do without a mother's care, to Shiloh and handed him over to the care of the aged Eli, who at that time occupied Aaron's position as High Priest. He was probably employed in such small duties about the Tabernacle as a child could perform, and we may infer from the fact of his promptly responding in the night to what he supposed were Eli's calls, that he was a personal attendant on the aged priest. Whether there was at the time any expectation of his succeeding Eli, does not appear. Hannah had nothing to do with his future. She gave him to the Lord to be used in any way he pleased. That the precious gift was acceptable there was soon evidence. Child, though he was, he was intrusted with a divine commission. God made him his servant to carry a message. It was not a pleasant duty, for the message was a warning of impending punishment. The child shrank from delivering it, but he learned then, as many a servant of God has learned since, that the truth must be spoken, however painful it may be for speaker and hearers. More than once, in after life he had a similar duty of speaking unpalatable truths and warning people that their course would lead to punishment. Eli received the message in meekness though it must have been a terrible humiliation to him to have God pass over him as the High Priest and speak to a child. Whether he continued to be the same indulgent father he had been we are not told. It was twenty years before the blow fell, but it fell at last, so we may conclude that if Eli made any attempt to reclaim his sons, it failed. They were bad men, and it was not altogether due to their training; for under the same man's training Samuel grew up to be a great and good man. It is a singular fact, too, as showing how far goodness is from being hereditary, that Samuel's own sons turned out badly.

Samuel did not yet know the Lord. A beautiful description of a new relationship is given in the life of Henry Ward Beecher. He used to relate how when he was four years old he and his brothers, and sisters were told that their father was bringing home a new mother to them, their own mother having been dead two or three years. They wondered very much what kind of mother she would be. It was a momentous matter to them. Henry said that to old age he remembered the night she came. He and his brother were sent to bed and were just falling asleep, when a racket downstairs told them she had arrived. Presently there was a rustling on the stairs and then a shadow in the room just visible in the twilight. Then he said "somebody leaned over the bed and kissed Charlie and me and said, 'Be good children and I will see you to-morrow.' I remember well, how happy I was. I felt that I had a mother." God comes very much as to the human soul, in shadow and with love to be known better by and by.

The Lord called Samuel. "Where is Tom?" a merchant asked of his wife on his return home, "I want him to go with a message to Mr. Westall's." The wife said, "Had you not better send Will? Tom is so little to carry an important message, and I suppose this is important." The merchant said, "Yes, it is important and that is why I want Tom to go. If I sent Will he would elaborate it and say something different. Tom will say exactly what I tell him. Besides Will's head is full of other things, while Tom will be glad to be honored with the trust that I will think of nothing else." So Tom was called and sent. Samuel was but a child when God called him, but he received the message and delivered it.

Speak for thy servant heareth. There are many kinds of hearing. Some hear out of curiosity, some for amusement and some to get good. A woman who kept a little country store went to hear a new preacher who had come into the neighborhood. The sermon was on honesty and right dealing and the woman paid close attention. The next day the preacher happened to see her and recognized her as an attentive hearer of the day before. He accosted her and mentioned having noticed her at the service. He led her to talk about the sermon and was disappointed on finding she did not remember any of it, even the text. He said, he feared, it had not made much impression on her. "We," said the woman, "my memory is a bit bad. I can't remember much I hear; but I remembered to burn my measure. It was not quite as big as it ought to be. I didn't mind so long as the customers didn't notice it; but after hearing your sermon, I can go home and burned it."

He restrained them not. Eli's sons were grown men when this message came to Samuel. We can imagine that he would appeal to them then to mend their ways, but it was too late. A great surgeon stood before his class to perform an operation on a diseased man. With strong and gentle hand he did his work successfully so far as his part of the terrible business went; and then he turned to his pupils and said: "Two years ago a safe and simple operation might have cured this man. Ten years ago a wise way of life would have prevented his contracting the disease. I have done my best for him as the case stands; but nature will have her word to say. She does not always consent to the repeal of her capital sentences." Next day the patient died.

TO AID STRICKEN ARMENIA.

erica Responding Cheerfully to the Appeal of the Sufferers—Relief Work Begun in England—All the Civilized Nations Agitated over the Wrongs of the Christians in Asiatic Turkey—The Destitution at Van and Bitlis.

NOT since the time of the great Russian famine, when the peasants in sixteen provinces of that country were dying for want of bread, has the heart of Christian America been so deeply stirred as it now is by the woes of the people of Armenia. Many warm letters of approval of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S course in sending a Commissioner to that afflicted country have been received within the last few days, and a stream of contributions has begun to pour in which promises to swell the Relief Fund to such proportions as must accomplish much good in alleviating the distress there. Mr. W. W. Howard, our representative, is now in all probability, in Turkish dominions, and we may soon expect to hear by the cable, that he has reached the scene of his future labors. As soon as he arrives at Van, the centre of operations, his missionary committee will be organized and relief work will begin in earnest. Every dollar sent to us for that purpose will be forwarded to the committee, though the Bible Society or the Ottoman Bank, and not one dollar will be diverted to any other purposes. It should be stated in this connection, that the expenses of Mr. Howard's journey to and from Armenia and while engaged in the relief work, are to be defrayed by the proprietor of this journal, and to be in no case a burden on the Relief Fund. Arrangements have already been made by which Mr. Howard and the Committee, immediately after the former reaches Van, will have funds at command to begin the work without a day being lost. Every day gained may mean the saving of many precious lives.

The action taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in sending a Commissioner to Armenia, and receiving contributions for the relief of the suffering people of that country, is universally approved. All contributions should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, N.Y.

The following letter, received from the Duke of Westminster, affords new evidence of the widespread destitution in Armenia:

" the Editor of The Christian Herald:

SIR:—There is an additional distressing phase connected with the sufferings of the Armenians consequent on the losses they have sustained at the hands of the Turks, which calls for consideration and assistance from those who are ever ready to relieve distress in whatever part of the world. Vice-Consul Shipley reports from Moush, that 'there is great distress, amounting in a great number of cases to abject destitution, among the fugitives from Sassoun, of which he and his colleagues have had many opportunities of convincing themselves from personal observation.' Mr. Howard, Her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Van, testifies that the need for relief is unquestioned; that there is an enormous amount of destitution, and that there will certainly be more before next winter.

This applies, we are assured, to the province of Bitlis, and to a large extent to Kheroum, where there are survivors of the Sassoun massacre—mostly women and children who have no one to provide for them—scattered about. A year ago these people were comparatively prosperous and comfortable, but are now barefoot and in rags, begging their daily bread from those who are not much better off than themselves.

"Consul Graves forwards a private letter describing the deplorable condition of the people at Talvorig:—'There are about 850 of these houseless wanderers now living in the woods and mountains, in caves and hollow trees, half naked, and some, indeed, entirely without covering for their nakedness. Bread they have not tasted for months, and curdled milk they only dream of, living, as they do, upon greens and the leaves of trees. There are two varieties of greens which are preferred, but these are disappearing, as they wither at this season. Living on such food, they become sickly; their skin has turned yellow, their strength is gone, their bodies are swollen, and fever is rife among them.'

"In addition to these, there are thousands of refugees, who, compelled by poverty and danger to abandon their village homes, have flocked into the towns where they hope to find personal safety and charity to keep them alive.

"The Committee of the Armenian Relief Fund has already remitted £3,000 to Sir Philip Currie, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, for the distribution of food and clothing in the distressed districts, and further aid is very urgently required.

WESTMINSTER."

Grosvenor House, London, W., Sept. 20th, 1895.

Additional gravity has been given to the situation by recent events in Constantinople. A disturbance occurred in that city, arising out of an attempt by a number of Armenians to present a petition to the government, reciting the grievances of their countrymen and demanding reform and redress. Crowds assembled at the gate of the Grand Vizier's palace, and as the demonstration looked threatening, the police of the city attempted to disperse the gathering. A frightful riot resulted, during which many persons were killed, the majority of the victims being Armenians. Afterward, a number of Armenians were slain in the streets and hundreds were arrested. Fears were entertained of a general massacre. A large party of Armenians took refuge in the residence of the Armenian Patriarch and others sought asylum in the churches.

In a cable dispatch from Constantinople, from a source strongly favorable to the government, it is claimed that leniency was employed in dealing with the Armenians engaged in the demonstration. Neither troops nor rifles were used against them, the police alone being sufficient. The dispatch adds:

Nobody pretends to deny that the suffering among the Armenians, especially in the remote districts of their country, is still very great and is increasing. Thousands are literally starving, and it is hopeless to expect that the Turkish government will do more than to prevent further persecutions.

One result of the present troubles is the dismissal of the Grand Vizier, Said Pasha, and the recall to power of Kiamil Pasha, who formerly occupied that office. His appointment is viewed in many quarters as indicating a disposition on the part of Turkey ultimately to satisfy the demands of the Powers for reforms in Armenia. Meanwhile, the situation is so full of menace that United States Minister Terrell has made a demand upon the Porte for the efficient protection of American missionaries. All the foreign Ambassadors are aiding in the preservation of order.

Further corroboration of the pitiful condition of the peasants of Van and surrounding provinces, is found in a letter received in England which says: To-day most of the Armenians in Van and Bitlis provinces are on the verge of starvation. Many in fact have already died of hunger. The moneys thus far collected in England and elsewhere are not enough for the needs of the Sassoun people alone, and there are thousands of others in like predicament. It is feared that the troubles in Constantinople may have a deplorable effect upon them, and that they may be rendered desperate by reason of long and hopeless suffering.

From the very large number of letters received during the week we make the following extracts:

L. A. B., White Oak, Ontario, Can. ($2):
May all Christian hearts go out to the Armenians in sympathy and help them all they can. I thank God every day for the peace we are enjoying, and that we can worship him unmolested.

Friend, Allentown, Pa. ($2), writes:
I send this wishing I could send more. May God's blessing rest upon it and relieve the poor, suffering Armenians is my prayer.

Mrs. H. H., Esperance, N. Y., says:
I have been reading in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about the poor, persecuted Armenians, and I enclose eleven dollars to be sent to them. I wish I was rich enough to make it eleven hundred. What I can send seems so little to alleviate such misery, but I hope many will respond to the call and may God help.

M. E. S., Rootstown, Ohio, says:
This being the eighty-fourth birthday of my dear wife and the sixty-fourth year of our marriage, we send you this thank-offering of five dollars for the poor, suffering Armenians. The Lord, and the people who possess, have mercy on them.

The following contributions to the Armenian Relief Fund are acknowledged:

MARY AND JESUS.

MOST of the ancient artists tried their hand at the Virgin and the Child, always evidencing their own nationality in the style of infantile beauty selected. The Dutch school gives a Dutch child, the Roman school a Roman child, the Spanish school a Spanish child. Rubens' Christ was not born at Bethlehem, but at Antwerp. And as parents are not apt to undervalue their children, it is probable that they took the model which sat in their own nursery, gathering around it their own ideal of the infant Jesus. Francesco Tacconi represents the Holy Child as very thoughtful, a young philosopher at one year of age, with very red hair. Vivarini gives us a startled child. Duccio paints for us a child wrapped up in admiration of its mother. But Lo Spagna gives us the look of a glad child that would romp if it were not afraid of jumping out of the picture. Why not a glad child? The burdens had not yet rolled over on him. Those were good days to him. Joseph and Mary walked and trudged, but he always had a soft carriage to ride in—that of his mother's bosom. He had enough to wear, for he was wrapped in swaddling-clothes. He probably had enough to eat, for mothers in those days were not pinched to death with corsets, so the child need not go outside its mother's arms for abundant supply. But any pleasant afternoon when the children of our city are out taking an airing, I could find a score of infant faces more like Jesus than any I have seen on ancient canvas. Perhaps, after a while, an American artist will give us the Virgin and the Child. He would be more apt to be impartial than any of the ancients. They put their own nationality into the picture, and it was a German Christ, or a Venetian Christ, or a Tuscan Christ; but the American, having in him the blood of many lands, and in his face a commingling of the features of all nations, when he gives us upon canvas Mary and the child, it will be a world's affection bending over a world's Christ.

A PARISIAN WONDER.

I ASK the people recently returned from foreign travel if in all their journeying they saw anything more wonderful than the Champs Elysees, the chief street of Paris. On your way through the street you wander into grottoes, where, over colored rocks, the water falls, now becoming blue as the sea, now green as a pond, and now, without miracle, it is turned into wine. There are maiden-hair trees, and Irish yews, and bamboo, and magnolias, and banks of azaleas, and hollies, and you go through a Red Sea of geraniums and dahlias dry-shod. You leave on either hand concert-castles, and parti-colored booths, and kiosks inviting to repose, till you come to the foot of the Arc de Triomphe, from the foot of which radiate eleven great avenues, any one of which might well be a national pride, and all of them a-rumble with pomp and wealth, and the shock of quick and resonant laughter. On opposite sides of the archway are two angels, leaning toward each other till their trumpets well-nigh touch, blowing the news of a hundred victories. Surely never before or since was hard stone ever twisted into such wreaths, or smoothed into such surfaces. Up and down frieze and spandrel are altirelievi with flags of granite, that seem to quiver in the wind, and helmets that sit soft as velvet on warrior's brow; and there are lips of stone that look as if they might speak, and spears that look as if they might pierce, and wounds that look as if they might bleed, and eagles that look as if they might fly. Here stands a angel of war, mighty enough to have been just hurled out of heaven. On one side of the Arch, Peace is celebrated by the sculptor with sheaves of plenty, and chaplets of honor, and palms of triumph. At a great height, Austerlitz is again enacted, and horse and horsemen and artillery and gunners stand out as though some horror of battle had chilled them all into stone. By the time that you have mounted the steps, and stand at the top of the Arch, the evening lamps begin a running fire on all the streets. The trees swing lanterns, and the eleven avenues concentrating at the foot of the Arch pour their brightness to your feet, a very chorus of fire. Your eye treads all the way back to the Tuileries on bubbles of flame, and stopping half-way the distance to read, in weird and bewitching contrivance of gaslight, an inscription with a harp of fire at the top, and an arrow of fire at the bottom, the charmed word of every Frenchman, "Champs Elysees!"

THE ARISTOCRACY OF MEASLES.

WE see by the foreign papers that the children of a prince and princess have lately been down with the measles. What? Are not the families of royalty free from the aches and ailments of other households? No. We are all of one blood, and when that blood breaks out, accompanied with dry tongue, and high fever, and running eyes, it is measles. The children of imperial families must go through with the same undignified mumps, whooping cough, and toothache as the little ones of less notoriety. The armed guard at the palace gate can hinder the entrance of none of the distempers. We are all wondrously alike, though varieties of fortune may seem to obliterate all similarities. The aches and pains which Adam bequeathed his descendants have run to such compound interest that there is enough for all the race. One in struggle, one in misfortune, one in sin—may we all be one in sympathy.

NEW PRAYERS.

HOW to get out of the old rut without twisting off the wheel, or snapping the shafts, or breaking the horse's leg, is a question not more appropriate to every teamster than to every Christian worker. Having once got out of the old rut, the next thing is to keep out. There is nothing more killing than ecclesiastical humdrum. Some people do not like the Episcopal Church because they have the same prayers every Sabbath, but have we not in non-Episcopal churches for the last ten years been hearing the same prayers over and over again? the product of a self-manufactured liturgy that has not the thousandth part of the excellency of those petitions that we hear in the Episcopal Church. In many of our churches sinners hear the same exhortations that they have been hearing for the last fifteen years, so that the impenitent man knows, the moment the exhorter clears his throat, just what is going to be said; and the hearer himself is able to recite the exhortation as we teach our children the multiplication table forward or backward. We could not understand the doleful strain of a certain brother's prayer till we found out that he composed it on a Fast-day during the yellow fever in 1837, and has been using it ever since. There are laymen who do not like to hear a sermon preached the second time, who yet give their pastors the same prayer every week at the devotional meeting, that is, fifty-two times in the year, with occasional slices between meals. If they made any spiritual advancement, they would have new wants to express and new thanksgivings to offer. But they have been for a decade of years stuck fast in the mud, and they splash the same thing on you every week. We need a universal church-cleaning, by which all canting and humdrum shall be scrubbed out.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A. W. Robinson, Riverside, Cal. In THE MAIL-BAG last week I saw an inquiry for the hymn, "All is Well." I have it in "The Harp," published in 1890.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. Why is the word "trespasses" used so often in churches in the Lord's Prayer, instead of the Scriptural word, "debts" or "sins?"

It is a survival of the English prayer-book, which followed the translation in the Bibles in existence when it was composed. The word is not unscriptural. It is retained in both the Authorized and the Revised Versions in Matthew 6: 14, in the report of Christ's exposition of the prayer.

William Basyo, Glenn's, Va. Did the men who were with Paul when he was stricken down on the way to Damascus, hear the voice speaking to him? In Acts 9: 7, they were said to have heard; in Acts 22: 9, they are said not to have heard.

The only reasonable explanation of the apparent contradiction is that in the latter passage Paul meant that they did not understand the words spoken. They heard the noise but not articulate words. In the one case the account is believed to have been written by Luke and in the other it is Paul who is speaking.

H. B., Thornton, Walter, Ala. Who were the sons of God and the daughters of men referred to in Genesis 6: 4?

Ancient commentators believed that the "sons of God" were angels, but latterly, the scholars who do not accept the theory of evolution, have held that they were descendants of Seth and possibly of Abel, who married children of Cain. Evolutionists hold that they were the higher type of men allying themselves with women of the lower type who were practically animals.

A. E. B., New York. Husband died years ago and later my only child. And now, being left alone, do you think God looks upon it as a sin to still grieve for that child when she was all I had?

No, human grief is not a sin; it is the natural out-flowing of the love in the heart. But the Christian is sustained and comforted, amid such sorrows, by the knowledge that the loved ones are safe with God, and by the hope of rejoining them when this life is ended. Such reflections take all the bitterness out of death, for we know that our loved ones are not gone from us forever. (See II. Sam. 12: 22, 23.)

Earnest Reader, Alinda, Canada. Is the blessing of holiness entirely separate from that of regeneration?

Holiness, as the word is generally understood, refers to the end of the progressive work of the Holy Spirit on the heart. Regeneration is the new birth, which is a completed act, not a process. When a man believes in Christ, he is justified and the righteousness of Christ is imputed to him. Then commences the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit and he grows in grace becoming more and more like Christ. There is all the difference between them that there is between birth and growth.

C. W. C., Columbus, O. 1. When the private life of a minister who preaches well, is believed to be not of the best, should one go to hear him, or stay away from his ministry in the hope of driving him from the pulpit? 2. Where can I obtain literature on the best method of conducting Sunday Schools?

1. It is first of all important to be charitable. Reports as to the evil private lives of ministers are often false. Then, too, perfection must not be expected in a minister. Being human he will have faults. If, however, he is clearly living in flagrant sin and is not struggling to free himself from it, he is a hypocrite, and you are not likely to get any good from his preaching. You had better absent yourself. 2. Write to the Sunday School Union, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Dunkards.—In reference to a reply in THE MAIL-BAG on September 18, to a question about the Dunkards, the following additional information is sent by Mr. J. S. Flory, of Los Angeles, Cal.:

"The Dunkards are more numerous in other States than in Ohio. In fact they have large numbers of communicants in all of the Western States, also in the central and Eastern States, excepting the New England States. Of late they are doing successful evangelizing in the Southern States, and are supporting prosperous missions in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; also have missionaries in India and Asia Minor. The age at which priests entered service of the Tabernacle was twenty- (Numb. 8: 24), and the Temple twenty Chron, 28: 27), and it is probable that Aaronic priests were permitted to officiate about those ages. 2. THE WAR IN MADAGASCAR.

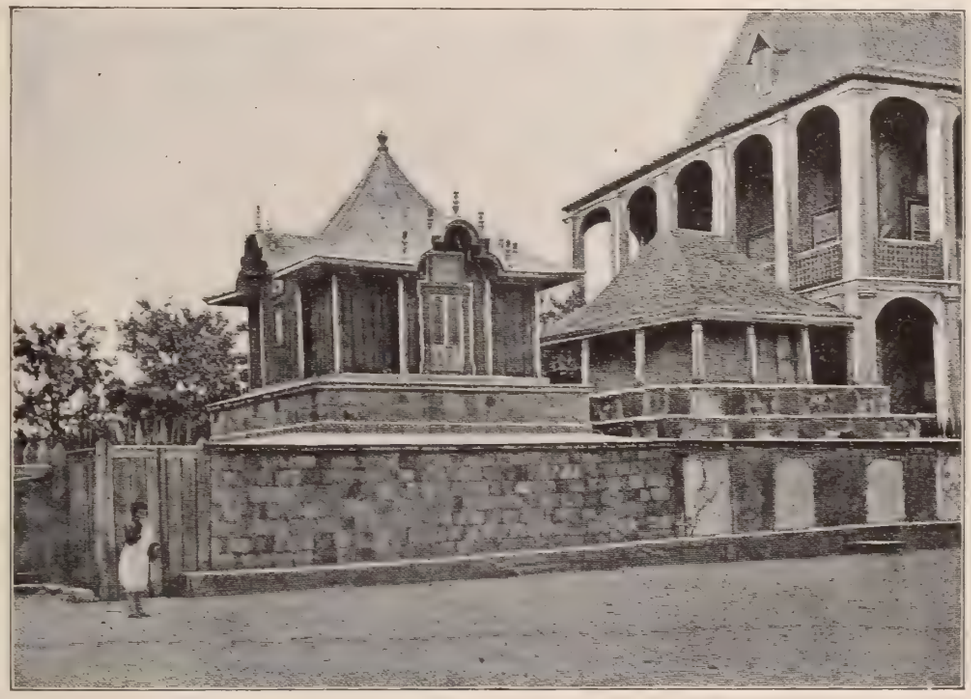
FRENCH journals report the expedition in Madagascar to be nearing the capital and probably by this time it has entered the city. It appears that Gen. Duchesne, who is in command of the expedition has been compelled to withdraw the fresh regiments which were sent in advance, and to supply their place with Sakalavas who are natives of Madagascar, but have always been rebellious subjects of the Hovas dynasty and are now eager allies of the invaders. Senegalese troops have also been employed in the advance columns. These and the Sakalavas are inured to the climate and do not suffer from the fever as the French do. The mortality among the latter is appalling. The responsibility of much of this rests with the commissariat and transportation departments, which, according to dispatches to French journals have been inefficient. The Lebebridge wagons which were to carry the ground supplies to the army from the nearest depot on the river proved unfit for the mountain roads and useless in the roads through the forests. The army has consequently suffered severe privations, which have rendered them less susceptible to fever and dysentery that have been working terrible havoc among them. Should the invaders succeed in capturing the capital, it will be impossible to maintain possession of it unless a railroad is built at once across the island from Majunga to Tamatave, which will make the capital in communication with both the east and west coasts. The Hovas, however, declare that the French shall never have permanent hold on Antananarivo. They threaten to burn it if defence proves futile and thus, even in defeat, inflict a disaster on their foe, as the Russians did at Moscow, when Napoleon captured that city. Should they fulfil their threat the French would be in a critical position, far away from their base of supplies, without shelter, and with the rainy season at hand. It is doubtful, however, whether the Malagasy people have sufficient courage to make such a sacrifice. They would be proud of their capital and would be reluctant to destroy it. To the untravelled mass of it is a magnificent city and for some of the buildings they have an almost superstitious veneration. Among these latter are the two structures represented in the picture on this page. They stand near the royal palace and contain the remains of King Radama I., and Queen Ranavalona, the most powerful monarchs of the Hova dynasty. This invasion is a most cowardly act on the part of France which its rulers will have to answer at the bar of God, whom the Malagasy love and serve. Retribution will surely fall on the nation for its evil deed. God has often warned it for its sins and the means are at hand to punish it for this new crime. France may yet hear, in the presence of a relentless foe in its own capital the voice of God saying, as he said to another nation long ago:

"I will recompense them according to their deeds, and according to the works of their own hands." Jer. 25: 14.



THE WAR IN MADAGASCAR—TWO ROYAL TOMBS AT ANTANANARIVO.

The Woes of a Pleasure Party.

A pleasure excursion along the Long Island shore on Oct. 1 had an experience that made the name a misnomer. The owner of a small yacht invited five young men to take a cruise with him up the Sound. The weather was not altogether favorable for amateur yachtsmen at the start, and it grew more stormy after noon. The thermometer, too, gradually dropped, and the summer clothing of the guests was not thick enough to keep them from shivering. As the yacht had only an open cabin, which had been delightfully cool in summer, but afforded no protection from the cold blasts that blew down the Sound that day, the party were soon thoroughly chilled. At Sand's Point the discomforts of the trip reached their culmination. The Captain either mistook his course, or the steering gear was out of order. Before he was aware of it the yacht was in shallow water, and a heavy sea was carrying it irresistibly toward the beach. He begged his young guests to go overboard and push the yacht off. Reluctantly, clothes were thrown off, and soon five sturdy pairs of arms were shoving with might and main against the boat's side. But the sea and wind were too strong for them. The yacht settled on a bank of soft sand and remained immovable. The young men gave up the attempt to get her off, and clambered out of the icy water over the side and spent the night in a vain attempt to get warm. At daybreak they waded ashore and set out to walk home. This was a very different experience from the pleasure they hoped to have enjoyed, but it was only one day lost, and there was no one to blame. It is infinitely worse when, as often happens at the end of life, the dying man realizes that the pleasure Satan promised him in his service always proved illusive or had a bitter ending, and his whole life has been wasted. Then he blames himself for being deceived, and wishes he had heeded the warning of the Preacher who tested the value of such pleasures and declared:

Behold this also is vanity. (Eccles. 2: 1.)

A Costly Suit.

Two farmers in Southern Kansas are learning the ways of law courts at imminent risk of bankruptcy. One of the farmers had a Texas pony which was not worth ten dollars at the most. He kept it tied up while attending to some work on his farm, but the animal managed to free itself and wandered into the other farmer's cornfield. When the owner of the field saw it, some damage had been done and he seized the beast until he had obtained compensation. The owner of the pony succeeded in recovering his steed in a suit before a Justice of the Peace, and the owner of the field brought suit for damages. The case has been tried several times, with varying success, a disagreement of the jury in one instance involving a re-trial. At last it reached the District Court and the loser then took it to the Court of Appeals. It is soon to be tried there, and each man is determined, if the verdict goes against him, to take the case to the Supreme Court. Already the costs of the dispute about this ten-dollar pony are over a thousand dollars, and are likely to be double that amount before the case is finally settled. We are often told that Christ's injunction as to lawsuits is not suited to the present day, but this is certainly a case in which it would have been better for the litigants if either or both had followed it:

I say unto you that ye resist not evil . . . and if any man will sue thee at law and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. (Matt. 5: 39, 40.)

The Golden Key.

An advertisement appeared recently in a New York daily journal, stating that the advertiser desired an introduction to the best society in the city, and would pay liberally any person who could secure it for him. The advertisement was shown to a gentleman who is in fashionable life, and he was asked if social recognition could be secured in that way. His reply was significant. He said that an introduction might be gained by a money payment secretly given, but it would not avail unless the person introduced had the manners of a gentleman and knew how to conduct himself in the way expected of a member of the best circles. He knew cases of ignorant men who had suddenly become rich in some distant State, coming to New York and arranging on a money basis with some needy aristocrat for an introduction. In every case the attempt had been a failure. The man and his family were conscious of being out of their element, and were confused and uncomfortable in the society of the aristocracy. On the other hand, society found them incapable of appreciating its occupations or sharing in its pleasures, and speedily dropped them. The advertiser is, therefore, likely to lose his money without gaining what he seeks. The same mistake is sometimes made by wealthy men who hope that by liberal gifts or large legacies for religious purposes, they may enter heaven when they die. The rich may enter as well as the poor, but only by the same gate of the new birth. Without that they would not be happy if admitted. There was no ambiguity about Peter's answer to the man who tried to buy his way in Apostolic times:

Thy money perish with thee . . . Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter, for thy heart is not right. (Acts 8: 20, 21.)

The Megaphone.

Among the inventions that have been patented, but have not come into general use, is one that a scientific journal is recommending to the owners and captains of steamers. It is called the Megaphone, and is intended to enable a person to hear and speak with others at a distance, where the telephone is not available. It consists of two huge cone-shaped tubes eight feet long and three feet in diameter at the large ends, which diminish to an apex, to which rubber tubes are attached, with ivory ear-pieces. Between these tubes are two smaller ones constructed on the same pattern, but with a simgle mouth-piece. By placing the ear-pieces in the ears and applying the mouth to the mouth-piece, a person can hear sounds a long distance away and cause his voice to be heard at a long distance. It thus might enable a mariner to catch the sound of breakers a long way off, and to make himself heard by a passing vessel. It renders, therefore, a double service, aiding the ear as well as the voice, as the telephone does. As sailors are aware, this combination is very important. It is so also in the Christian life. The believer often forgets, in his difficulties, to call upon his Heavenly Father for direction, and still more frequently fails to hear the answer to his prayer:

Thou calledst in trouble and I delivered thee: I answered . . . . but my people would not hearken to my voice. Ps. 81: 7, 11.

BRIEF NOTES.

All Letters to Dr. Talmage as Editor of The CHRISTIAN HERALD, should be addressed to him at The Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

Rev. S. V. Robinson Administered the Rite of baptism a few days ago at the Mariner's Temple, New York, to a Polish Jew named Philip Spiewak. He had been for some months under the teaching of Rev. A. Lichtenstein. Mr. Spiewak is the son of a Rabbi in Warsaw, and had himself been trained to be a Rabbi.

Rev. C. O. Gill, who Recently Left New York for China to labor under the auspices of the Presbyterian Board, is a famous athlete. He was captain of the football team at Yale in 1889.

Revs. Crossley and Hunter, the Canadian evangelists, are completing their programme for their winter's work. Churches desiring their services may address them at St. Thomas, Ont., Can.

The Prophetic Conference which was to be held at Allegheny City, Pa., at the end of October, will, it is now announced, not be held until December. Inquiries should be addressed to Prof. Moorhead, Xenia, O.

The Pacific Garden Mission, of Chicago, has issued its annual report. It appears that its expenses last year were $5,611. The total aggregate attendance was over 200,000. An average of from nine to fifteen persons each night rose to ask help in seeking Christ.

The Christian Work among American Art students in Paris is making progress. A recent visitor to the little iron church in the Latin Quarter found over a hundred young artists at the service. Rev. Samuel P. Kelley, the pastor of the church is deeply interested in his work and has the cordial respect of the artist colony.

The Annual Report of the Foreign Missions of the Moravian Church shows a deficit of $27,115. It is gratifying to learn that this is due very largely to a falling off in receipts from legacies, and not in contributions. The legacy generally closes a list of contributions running over many years and it is better for the church, that the testator should live and continue giving.

The Tabulated Results of Rev. C. H. Yatman's Ocean Grove meetings during the summer, so far as figures can represent spiritual work, are as follow: Conversions, upward of 500; backsliders reclaimed, 350; persons in spiritual difficulty specially helped, over 2,000. Mr. Yatman received a cordial welcome on his arrival at Honolulu.

The Ninth Annual Convention of Christian Workers in this country and Canada will be held in New Haven, Conn., Nov. 7th to 15th. It will be under the charge of Rev. R. A. Torrey, of the Moody Institute, Chicago. The topics for discussion will, as before, have special reference to the most successful methods of Christian work among the classes not reached by the ordinary work of the Church.

The Value of the Christian Endeavor Society in church work was inadvertently demonstrated recently in an English town. A church official who disapproved of the Society spoke against it in church meeting and predicted that it would eventually "smash up the weekly church prayer-meeting." "There were only sixty present last week," said he. "Yes," was the pointed rejoinder of his pastor, "and forty-six of those were Christian Endeavorers."

The Students of Taylor University at Fort Wayne, Ind., had the pleasure of a visit recently from Bishop Taylor, for whom the University is named. He gave them an address and a truly episcopal benediction. Dr. Reade, the President of the University, reports that the fund being raised to assist needy students in gaining an education and for other educational purposes in connection with the institution, is making gratifying progress, and there are good prospects of the beneficent work being largely extended.

Bishop Potter of New York has been the means of relieving a business embarrassment and preventing the continuance of extensive suffering. There has been a dispute between four hundred and fifty derrick men and their employers. The employees wanted their wages of $2.75 a day raised to $3, and when their employers refused to grant their request went on strike. The matter was mutually referred to the bishop, and after hearing both sides he decided that $2.00 would be a fair day's wages in the case. His decision was accepted by both parties. The strike was declared off.

...NADJA;...

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

GRISHA EXPLAINS TO THE GENERAL.

CHAPTER XIV.

Grisha and the General.

THE sudden and complete disappearance of the ferryman and his daughter was a mystery that the peasants of Slavo could not fathom. Search was made in all likely places without avail. The theory started by some one that Sozontieff had again gone off on his wanderings was untenable, because all his clothes, and books, and his icon of St. Nicholas, which he was known to venerate so highly, were intact. The search instituted by the General showed that Nadja had probably taken a few things with her, but no one could be quite sure of this. Grisha came in for much of the questioning—when he had seen his master and young mistress last, and where; if he had heard them speak of leaving Slavo, and so on. But either he would not or could not understand the questions, at any rate no one understood his evasive replies. He was cunning enough to give misleading answers, he certainly gave untrue ones. The only consideration that appeared to throw any light on the strange event was the ferry boat on the other side of the river. They had started for Kief during the night, perhaps on some urgent business, and might soon return. But as week followed week, and nothing was heard either of Sozontieff or his daughter, the village gave up speculating on their disappearance, and only spoke of it occasionally as one of those inexplicable things that sometimes happen on earth which God in his own good time would perhaps clear up.

The old General was uneasy about it all. He had an idea that Grisha probably knew more than he liked to tell, and his intelligence, more cultivated than that of the peasants, easily detected Grisha's subterfuges, and sinuous methods of replying to simple questions.

One evening, a month or so after the disappearance of the Sozontieffs, the General was sitting alone in his room. It was twilight and fast darkening, and the old man's thoughts were in keeping with the fading day and the fast approaching night. Since Vladimir's departure, his health, of late years so uncertain, had been a source of much uneasiness to him; his strength was fast declining, and he got no sleep.

Ah, if he could only sleep!

And [illegible] thoughts of how it had been mis-spent—the idleness, extravagance, vice, vacuousness that had marked it, became more and more a source of trouble to him, and to gain peace he turned to where, alas! he could not find it—to endless prayers and prostrations to his saints; to his hair shirt, to his books of devotion. If he could only do God some signal service, was his vain and foolish wish. If he could only show the Almighty how true a son of the Church he was!

And why could he not? Here at his very gates were the arch-enemies of the Orthodox faith, the men who were fast beguiling the simple peasantry, bringing in the soul-destroying tenets of Luther. He would begin a crusade against the Stundists and evince his zeal. These were his thoughts as he sat alone in the fading light of that May evening. But somehow down in the depths of his heart he doubted the efficacy of all this service. Could this make amends? he asked himself. Would this be restitution? Ah, restitution, that was the word that stuck. That was the word that threw his thoughts back twenty years,—to the cruel deceptions that followed one on the other at that time,—his flight to Moscow, and the utterly base and cruel desertion of the woman he had vowed to love. And if that had been all—but there was more. There was the terrible story the ferryman had told him of the child exposed beside the flooding river. Why had she done this? Why there of all places? Was it the insane thought that if no one found it, its poor deformed body would soon be at rest? But even this was not the worst. There was the night years ago in Moscow when he formed one of that gay company of men sitting around their champagne in the Hermitage Gardens, amid the din of a thousand blatant voices, the clinking of glasses, the rasping notes of empty laughter. They were boisterously enjoying some drunken witticism when there passed one whom memory forced him to recognize. Was it despair that had marked her as its own for ever? Ah, why dream of restitution? the General thought; it is impossible, impossible.

The General let his head sink on his breast. The thoughts of the miserable man were beyond his strength to bear. It was quite dark now.

"Your excellency," said the butler, opening the door and letting in a flood of light on the huddled-up old man. The servant started. "Your excellency, Grisha, the fool from the ferry, is here, and says he must see you. This is the fourth night running that he has come here bothering to see you, and last night he made such a row because we would not let him in that I boxed his ears, and to-night——"

"You boxed his ears!" The old man started from his chair and rushed at the servant with blazing eyes and clenched hands. "You struck Grisha! You! You scullion! You low-born lackey." The General raised his hand, but suddenly mastering himself, he turned helplessly back to his chair. His voice was low and hoarse when he spoke.

"Bring candles, and draw the blinds. Tell the boy I will see him."

The servant bowed low and retired, and after he had attended the General with the candles he told his fellows in the kitchen that in his opinion the master was just as mad as Grisha, and that when he saw him in such a towering passion he actually saw a likeness in him to the ferryman's fool. Wasn't it strange? he asked.

And then he began a long rigmarole about his mother, who had nursed a prince in St. Petersburg, always declared that she could not see a bit of difference between him and her own boy except for a wart on his arm, which of course wasn't on the face, and made no matter.

Grisha entered the General's room gazing slowly and deliberately on all sides, taking no notice of the master of the house who sat there in his chair, shrunken, fixedly watching every movement of his visitor with a fascinated stare. Certainly Grisha's was a weird enough figure. His long, lank, black hair fell about a death-pale face, the eyes large and deep-sunken—the only redeeming feature in a hopelessly marred and senseless visage. There was the terrible hump, the long restless arms, the misshapen legs. And what the butler in his quip in the servants' hall said he saw, the General saw only too plainly. In the fool's face he saw the distorted image, the tragic burlesque, of his own features.

"Grisha, come here, nearer. Now what is it you want? Isn't it late for you?"

"Yes, it's late, but I like the late—ever since master went away."

Now whether it was the General's perceptions were keener than those of his peasantry, or that Grisha took greater trouble to express himself clearly this evening, his words and ideas had a coherence and meaning to the General that only Nadja and sometimes Mikhail could discover in them.

"Are you not lonely, Grisha, since the ferryman went away? Would you not like him to come back?"

"No, I'm not lonely. I am out all day watching the sheep untill Nadja comes back. Master will never return."

"How does Grisha know that?"

"The icon told me, the Wonder-Worker." Grisha's eyes looked shiftily from corner to corner of the room, searching for the General's icon, and when he found it he made three low obeisances before it."

"The icon!" exclaimed the General, incredulously, "the icon told you!"

"Yes, it's about the icon that I came here. I want you to take it away."

"But it is not mine, and besides, I have my own icons."

"Yes, but this icon speaks, and yours does not. It told the ferryman everything he wanted to know, and since he went away it has been speaking to me."

Again the incredulous smile on the General's face, but to please Grisha he fell in with his humor.

"And what has the icon been saying to Grisha?"

"It wanted to tell me all about Nadja and master, where they were and why they went away, but I was afraid and ran out of the "izba." It told me one morning that it must be hung up in your room, that it has much to say to you about yourself and about Panitch Vladimir. Panitch has heard the icon speak to master when he used to come to see Nadja."

"To see Nadja! Vladimir!"

"Yes, he used to come often, but when she began to cry and get white he came no more. I heard the icon tell master all about Panitch."

It was most puzzling to the General. The idea of a speaking icon was of course pure nonsense, although he was no stranger to the notion often entertained among the more religious of the peasantry that the icon constantly inspires their actions and makes suggestions. But there was more here than he knew, and Grisha must be humored. The boy lived in abject fear of the icon, and ever since Sozontieff's disappearance he had carefully obscured its face with a cloth. The cottage still remained unoccupied, and Grisha dared not live there. So he hit upon the expedient of trying to induce the General to remove the Wonder-Worker. He would in this way be rid of a constant terror. During the night he would often rise from his bed in the haystack to see that the curtain still hung before it. He was as firm a believer in its supernatural powers as the ferryman had been, and imagined that its terrible voice could penetrate to any hiding-place he might prepare for himself near the cottage. He was not afraid of any revelation it might make to the General about the murder. He had a notion that Vladimir was the ultimate cause of Sozontieff's death, and he knew that the General loved Vladimir.

"Grisha, you say the icon knows all about Vladimir and about the ferryman and his daughter. Now suppose I bring it up here, and it refuses to tell me anything, what then?"

"It will speak, Barin. It will tell you strange things. You will hear how master was killed. Yes," Grisha bent forward and whispered with his eyes aflame, "he was killed at the sands. Come and I'll show you the place. I'll show it to you if you don't ask who did it. The icon will tell you Nadja is alive. I know where she is."

The General's head was bowed, and from the disconnected words of the fool some connected thoughts were revealing themselves. They were awful thoughts. Grisha interrupted his reverie.

"Barin, let us go for the icon. I will show you where it is, and you'll take it down from the wall, and bring it up here. Keep it until Nadja comes. But she will never come for it," he added, "she's afraid of it and hates it like I do."

The General made no answer. He was thinking of other things and of other days, and when Grisha grew insistent he turned his gaze on the half-witted youth and remembered what he was, and who he was, and shuddered. At any rate here ere might be some restitution attempted. He could give this boy care and guardianship, all too late, perhaps, but he would try.

"Grisha, come nearer; nearer still.

The hunchback approached, and the old man put out his hand and placed it on the long tangled black hair, so unkempt and uncared for. He ran his fingers through it, muttering "Grisha, poor Grisha, God only knew." He looked at his grimy face, his toil-stained hands, his tattered rig clothing, and thought of the slave's life he must have led. "It shall cease," he determined, the boy must live with him and again he looked into the fool's eyes, and stroked his hair and his face with his white be-ringed fingers.

"Grisha, would you like to live here with me in this house? We let the icon stay where it is, and it not worry you if you lived here."

It was all inexplicable to poor Grisha the fondling hand, the gentle look old man, the strange request to live him. Again the General spoke the words, and Grisha began to realize

"No, no, Barin; I will wait at the for Nadja. Some day she'll return ferry her across. She would come when I am here, and I must be there she comes. But the icon must be down. She will never live there while remains. Take it away, Barin. away to-night."

The moon was shining through young woods and on the dew-spangled grass as these two made their way twisting bye-paths, avoiding the down to the river. The river lay milky mystic lake before them; the man's squalid, black cottage lay shadow of the misty sand dunes. The General held Grisha's arm, the hunchback supporting and directing his feeble

"Grisha, Grisha," he said repeatedly, "come and live with me."

"When Nadja comes," was his only answer.

They entered the cottage, and the General struck a light.

"There it is," said the fool, pointing to the curtained icon, "take it down, take it away. It is yours. It will tell you what you ought to know."

The icon was taken down from the wall, the General standing on Sozontieff's chair.

"Take this also," said Grisha, handing his companion the old Slavonian Bible. "It is the book that strikes you blind when you tell lies. Nadja told the truth. Only Panitch told lies, but then he never had the book in his hands. Put it to his hands when he comes from the sea, and ask him where Nadja is."

Grisha crouched down on his pallet of straw, bed which he had occupied since the house was masterless, buried his face in his hands, and sobbed as from a broken heart. "Nadja, Nadja," he kept repeating, "come back. He's gone away, he who told you the lies. He won't return to trouble you. Come back, the ferry is ready on the sands every morning at daybreak."

The General sank back into the chair, and Grisha rocked backward and forward, expressing in broken tones his grief at the loss of Nadja.

The old man tried to comfort him, but gave no heed.

"If Panitch comes back she only! And then with sudden fierceness "Tell Panitch if ever you see him again that the sands wait for him too."

The light was spluttering low in its socket when the General slowly rose from his chair, carrying she icon and the book of ordeal.

"A quiet night, Grisha," said the General gently.

He opened the cottage door and went out into the night, and with feeble and slow steps walked up through the silent moonlight village, and on to his own great dark house. An utterly lonely and broken, a helpless and forsaken, man.

OBEDIENCE TO GOD.

ggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Oct. 27. Deuteronomy 8: 1-20.

E know of no analogy that brings the relations of the human race to God into so clear a light as that of the parental relation. The world was a long time in reaching it, and not until Christ revealed it was it lly perceived. The Jews, in their earlier story, although far ahead of other nations the purity and thrust of their religious eas, did not get beyond the nception of God as a lawgiv-. They thought of him as ern and relentless, a Being in-piring awe by his power and solute righteousness. The ne-ssity of obedience was, how-er, distinctly recognized and en in their rebellion, they were nscious that inevitable pun-ment awaited them. In the earer light that comes from the velation of God as a Father, e recognition of the duty of edience loses none of its force, it rather gains an increased bligation. It would be a great-shame to disobey a loving fa-er than to break the law of a spot.

How this obligation of obedi-ce operates in childhood we ell know. The little toddler a year old, who puts out his nd to touch the pretty glow the stove, is snatched away; d neither struggles nor tears ill induce the mother to let him uch the red-hot metal. By d by he understands, and ould not wish to touch it, even ough his mother were not esent to prevent him. He hows it would burn him. A ry little boy knows as much that,but there are other things a like kind that he does not ow. He wants some danger-s toy; wants to play instead going to school; wants to sit late at night and lie late in e morning. Again the moth-'s "No," is interposed. His erty and freedom of action e restricted in a hundred ways. and by he experiences a ange of view about these re-rictions, similar to that he ex-rienced about the stove. When goes out into the world, he ows that he is a better man r not having had his own ay when a boy. He under-ands that his mother was not ting in caprice or with a de-re to abridge his happiness, when she ve-ed his projects and plans, but was con-ulting his own happiness, with a wisdom rn of her larger observation and experi-ce. When he attains maturity, there is beautiful harmony between him and his other, if she lives, and a reverent love for r memory if she is dead. He knows that his infany and childhood she was not a rant, but his wise and loving friend.

When men realize the same principles in eir relations with God, obedience becomes sy and the end and purpose of discipline attained. Perfect trust in his wisdom d love produces perfect docility. God ks for absolute trust—or faith, as the-ogy calls it. Thus obedience involves a mplete trust in God. We do not know e way by which he will lead us, nor the nditions to which he will lead us, but we now him. It involves a complete sur-nder of the will, a readiness to follow his ays, in spite of our inclinations, until at st we become Godlike, there is harmony etween his nature and ours, and we do oluntarily and spontaneously the things hat he wills. Law is then needed no more. r every man becomes a law to himself. Obedience also involves patience. Trials are ot always punitive. The example of Abra-am and the book of Job show that trials may be tests, that they may be sent to each some new truth, or to develop some ide of character. So in obeying God we ut our life into his hands and accept with heerfulness all that comes from him, being ssured that all things work together for ood to them that love him.

H., Reading, Pa., for the conversion of a man who has left the Evangelical Church and is wandering in the paths of error.

THE CLUE TO THE VISION.

The Explanation Given by the Angel to Daniel a Clue to the Interpretation of the Later Visions of the Prophet.

BY GEO. A. PEMBER, M. A.

IN regard to the beginning of the period, described as seventy sevens, during which so much was to be accomplished, the prophet is informed that it will be marked by the issuing of a decree to restore and build Jerusalem—not the Temple, of which there is no mention, but the City, the street and the moted wall.

Seeing, then, that the terms of the predicted decree are so precisely given, it seems strange indeed, that there should have been any difficulty in fixing its historical reference. Nevertheless, of four decrees which are mentioned in the Scriptures, the majority of commentators have selected those which did not fulfil the conditions of prophecy.

For some will have it that the allusion is to the decree of Cyrus. And yet, on turning to the first chapter of Ezra, we find no mention of the City with its street and wall, but only a charge "to build the House of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." In the sixth chapter of Ezra the very words of the decree are given, but there is no reference to anything save the rebuilding of the Temple and the restoration of the golden and silver vessels that pertained to it.

Even in the times of Nehemiah, a century later, Jerusalem is still described as lying waste, with its walls broken down, and its gates burned with fire. Hence it is evident that Cyrus did not allow the Jews to rebuild the walls that had been cast down by the Chaldeans: nor could it be reasonably expected that he should do so. For, owing to its strong situation, Jerusalem, if well fortified, was impregnable to the siege-strategy of those days. This we may see by the fact that the Chaldeans had to reduce it by famine; and that Titus, also, would scarcely have captured it, in spite of the struggles of opposing factions within its walls, had it not been for the failure of food. It is thus sufficiently clear, that the decree of Cyrus does not answer to the description given by Gabriel, since it contained no provision for the building of the City and its defensive walls.

The degree of Darius Hystaspes, again, was a mere confirmation of that of Cyrus, which had been countermanded by the Pseudo-Smerdis, and deals exclusively with the Temple and the vessels pertaining to it.

Nor does the letter given to Ezra by Artaxerxes Longimanus, in the seventh year of his reign, contain any clause respecting the building of the city or wall. It is a commission to inquire into the religious condition of the community in Judah and Jerusalem; and to organize the province beyond the river. Thus none of the decrees which we have mentioned fulfils the conditions of the prophecy.

Thirteen years after the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem, in the month Nisan, Nehemiah went into the royal presence to perform his duty as cup-bearer; and the king, observing the marks of sorrow upon his countenance, questioned him as to the cause of his grief. "Let the king live forever," was his reply: "why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?" Artaxerxes sympathized with his distress, and inquired what request he wished to make. Then, after praying to the God of heaven, Nehemiah said;—"If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favor in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my fathers' sepulchres, that I may build it."

THE CALVARY BAPTIST PULPIT

NEAR THE KINGDOM.

A Sermon preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, by Robert Stuart MacArthur. Text, Mark 12: 34: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God. And no man after that durst ask him any question."

THIS incident marks the close of the long series of attacks made upon our Lord in the tempie, on Tuesday of Passion-week. On that day by various forms of opposition, our Lord easily proved himself to be the Master of all his foes. We have not given him sufficient credit for the sacred shrewdness which he always manifested in contests with his opponents. These opponents laid traps for our Lord's feet; but he stepped lightly over them, while they, going stumbling after him, were caught in their own devices. Our Lord's power over his opponents was so great that this last critic, on that important day, was almost won to discipleship. In reading the Gospel we constantly discover that when the foes of Christ are brought into close touch with his great skill, and his mighty love, they are amazed beyond expression. The world has not yet fully known Christ. We are only beginning to apprehend the beauty of his character, the clearness of his intellect, and the gentleness of his heart.

> His cross, his manger and his crown,
> Are bright with glories yet unknown.

Wherever we see our blessed Lord he arrests our thoughts, elicits our admiration, evokes our enthusiasm, and calls forth our tenderest affection. It was said by the admirers of the eloquent Bourdaloue that they would rather hear repetitions from him than novelties from any other preacher. It may be said of every Christian that he would rather hear the story of his Lord's love than hear any story that ever came from the pen or lips of uninspired men. I bow my heart in fullest adoration at my Lord's feet this morning, as once more I present him to you as the object of affection and adoration.

Christ had just finished a conversation with the Sadducees, who had endeavored to ensnare him; and in the discussion he completely routed them. The Pharisees now undertake to question him by this scribe of whom the context speaks; but the scribe was wonderfully charmed by the wisdom of the Lord. You know that the scribes made numerous distinctions and classifications concerning the commandments of the law. They divided them into six hundred and thirteen parts, of which number three hundred and sixty-five were prohibitions, and two hundred and forty-eight were precepts. These were again divided into greater and less. It was, therefore, a matter of serious questioning on their part, as to which was the greatest command of the Lord. These Scribes were governed by a rather than by the spiritual significance of the divine teaching; they gave preference to the letter rather than to the spirit, to the ceremonial rather than to the moral element of the law. They differed greatly among themselves as to which commandment was pre-eminently important. This hair-splitting [illegible] the commandments. Jesus replied by giving the great law of love, first, to God, and, second, to man. He gave no new precept at the beginning, but the comprehensive summary found in Deuteronomy 6: 45. This quotation is in substance what every devout Jew read or recited every morning and evening [illegible] evening and evening in the city of New York to this very hour—"Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord!" This passage is a part of the Scripture which was on Jewish phylacteries and is to this hour. I suppose that that scribe had that sentence written on his phylactery at the very moment, and our Lord may have pointed to it while he quoted the words. Our Lord thus sanctioned the repetition of these words.

The second statement made by Christ is a summary of all the

to man. This is from Leviticus 19: 18. The second summary is implied in the first. Supreme love to God involves proper love to men. We show love to God whom we have not seen by loving our fellowmen whom we see.

I think of all the answers given by Christ, this is the most beautiful. The question was puzzling; the answer is exquisitely appropriate. The answer avoids the evasive, trifling, and insidious elements in the question. The answer is instructive, simple, exhaustive, and spiritual. It states a universal truth and duty; it is unchangeably important, and as appropriate to-day as when given by Christ. This intelligent Scribe had never before so clearly seen the spiritual importance of this great law; and so skillfully had Christ turned from unprofitable and unimportant speculation that the scribe burst forth in admiration of Christ's wisdom in reply to his question, saying, "Well, Master, thou hast said the truth."

"One of the finest touches in this fine picture is the change produced in the mind of the scribe. He became an admirer of Christ's wisdom; and Christ, in turn, says to him, "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God." Indeed, that scribe stood at that moment at the very doorway of the kingdom; he was almost a true follower of the Lord. He needed but the moral decision to enter; he needed only simple personal saving faith; he needed holy determination; he needed heroism to come out and confess Christ as his Lord and Saviour.

I have gone at length into the discussion of the context, and into the spirit and character of this scribe, because he is a type of men and women in our congregations to-day. To them I now make my appeal; to them I now address my heart. O, that God may grant that those who are standing at the very may step over the sill this morning, and be at home in the kingdom of God's dear Son.

In the first place, like this scribe, some of you are not far from the kingdom of God, so far as privileges are concerned. Many of you have enjoyed the blessings of an early Christian training; and it is almost impossible to over-estimate the advantages of early religious training. It is in youth that impressions are made that are lasting upon mind and heart; then it is that direction is given to all the subsequent life; then it is that seed is sown in the heart which, though it may long lie dormant, shall one day spring up and bring forth a harvest of good to men and of glory to God. It may be true that even the physical condition of the brain in youth is better adapted, than in latter life, to receive and to retain impressions. The older we grow, the more do we appreciate the instructions we have received in our early youth. God be thanked for godly mothers and praying fathers! God pity the man who will go down to perdition, trampling over a kneeling mother and slighting the counsels of a godly father! For such a man outer darkness will be darker than for others; for such a man hell will be more satanic than for those who never had youthful privileges and opportunities.

You have also enjoyed the advantages of growing up to mature years in a Christian atmosphere. There is such a Christian atmosphere about us who have had early Christian training. We feel it; we breathe it; we are blessed or cursed by it according as we improve or neglect it. We have it in spite of ourselves. Men say they will not listen to the story of Christ; they cannot help but listen. Christ when preached creates a blessed influence in every Christian home. Christ's name, Christ's cross, Christ's glory, we cannot but see and feel wherever we go, and whatever we do. These influences are round about us as an atmosphere; this morning you can no more get rid of them, than you can get rid of your own personality. They have saturated your life. You know that this presence seems to have eyes to see you and tongue to rebuke you when you sin. You cannot get away from this influence. God be thanked that and Christian churches generate such an influence that may be for the salvation of souls. I suppose there is no one in this audience who has not been conscious of the strivings of God's Holy Spirit. You have heard the still small voice of the Spirit saying, "My son, my daughter, give me thy heart." You have sometimes been arrested in business by that still small voice. It has whispered to you in the stillness of the midnight hour, when all other sounds were hushed. In London, in the vicinity of St. Paul's, it is said that you cannot hear the ringing of the bells in the day time, because of the rush and roar on the streets in this modern Babylon; but at night when all these sounds are hushed, the musical bells ring out on the midnight air, telling the city below of a city above, whose maker and builder is God. O, men and women, your privileges have been great; use them, else they will rise in judgment to condemn you. God help you not only to be near but to be in the kingdom of God!

Near in Principle.

I think, also in the second place, that many of you are like this scribe because you are near the kingdom of God, so far as your principles are concerned. I believe that this statement is profoundly true. Many of you have great respect for the Christian faith and for a consistent Christian life. You know you have. You know that I can justly appeal to you in that respect; you know that that respect gives me a claim to-day, to be heard when I urge you to come into God's kingdom. I would lift you over the door-sill into the kingdom of God now, if I could. You love truth; you admire manliness, and you hate hypocrisy and wickedness. A manly, honest, earnest, genuine Christian life you greatly admire. Men who are pious, honest, and noble elicit your sincerest admiration and arouse your noblest enthusiasm. These things you know are true. I think, furthermore, that many of you live an irreproachable life, so far as the standard of this world is concerned. You are good boys; you are manly men. You are good sons; you are loving husbands, you are devoted fathers. You would scorn to illtreat your father, your mother, your wife, or your children; and yet you are illtreating yourselves. Astounding! Unspeakable inconsistency! Many of you women are models in many relations in life; you are beautiful daughters, loving sisters, gentle wives and devoted mothers; and yet you are outside the kingdom of God. How my heart aches as I think of it; I sometimes feel that my ministry has been a failure. It certainly is, so far as some are concerned. I beg you to remember that I do not make light of your irreproachable lives; far from it. I would recognize the manliness of all these noble qualities. They are good so far as they go; but they are evil when they are made the goal, when they are trusted for salvation; when they are made

The Standard of Moral Attainment.

O, bring these lives to Jesus' feet; lay them down and ask him to let a Saviour's grace sweeten them; a Saviour's love inspire them; a Saviour's peace possess them. Thus they shall be made luminous with the light of Christ's Gospel, and radiant with the glory of Christ's cross. Many of you admire the character of Jesus; you cannot but admire it. It has been admired by many men in all ages of the world since he was upon the earth. But Christ wants more than admiration. I have sometimes felt my heart grow sick and faint when I have read the words of just praise spoken by unbelievers concerning Christ: when I have read Renan addressing Christ as "The Sweet Galilean." No, no, foolish man; I repudiate your praise of Christ, so long as you are disobeying Christ. Christ asks not your rhetorical praise; he demands the submission of your will, the adoration of your heart, the obedience of your life, and the trust of your whole soul. He demands your reverent trust; he Demands the Heart's Throne.

Away, away with the bright flowers that you would lay at Christ's feet, when you are putting thorns into his heart. He will have none of the flowers, except you will have none of the thorns.

Now allow me, in the last place, to say that many of you are not far from the kingdom of God, so far as your purposes are concerned. You propose to live up to the highest ideal as a man: but if the ideal be low, the attainment will be correspondingly low; if the ideal be high, the attainment will be much higher than otherwise. We cannot indeed attain fully to our ideal. If the young sculptor has before him the work of Phidias or Angelo, he will not himself to attempt to reach those high standards. So to-day I put before you Jesus Christ as the ideal man. He says, "Follow me!" Why do you not follow him? Why do you not select the highest ideal? I put before you that standard. I know, furthermore, that you propose some day to accept Jesus Christ as your Lord and Master. I do not suppose that there is even one person in this audience who does not propose some day to accept the Lord as his Lord and Master. But you are putting faith in to-morrow rather than in Jesus. You are on the road "By and By," and the Spanish proverb says, that the road "By and By," leads to the town of "Never." Why should you wait? Why should you not now own that purpose by consecrating your life and heart to Christ, and confessing him as your Lord and Master? Do it to-day! When will you be ever better prepared? When can he be more willing to receive you? Never! Do it just now. I know, too, that you propose some day to publicly confess Christ. Why not execute that resolve now? Oh, in that direction. We are told that the critical moment of that night in the year 1741, during the troubulous days in Russia, Count Lessoch went to conduct the princess Elizabeth to the palace to assert her right to the vacant throne; he found her irresolute and averse to action. He then drew forth two pictures which he had used to be prepared, and placed them before her. In one picture she saw herself under the torture and the Count on the scaffold; in the other she saw herself on the throne ascending the throne of all the Russias, while the people around her were filling the air with their loud plaudits. He bade her make her choice. She chose the latter and on the morning in triumph she ascended the throne.

To-day I hold before you two things pictures. One of Christ on the cross and you a rejoicing penitent; and the other Christ on his throne, and you rejected and banished to outer darkness. Choose which it shall be! God help you to choose right now! Bow in sweetest reverence at his feet now, and one day you shall hear him say, "come, ye blessed of my Father." Reject him, and one day you shall see Christ on the great white throne of judgment and hear him say, "depart, ye cursed, into everlasting punishment, prepared for the devil and his angels." It was not prepared for you; it never was prepared for you. You almost break God's heart in going down. This darkness never was meant for you; it was meant for the devil and his angels. Why should you make the devil's home your home?

Attractive, ardent, young scribe! Never was he so beautiful as when he came to Jesus. At this time the door of the kingdom was open; the music was floating out; the light was falling on the scribe's upturned face. O, wonderful moment! O, joy of heaven! Then he turned away. Will he ever come back? I do not know, but I hope so. I do not know, for touching that point the Scriptures are silent. Almost saved is not saved; almost in the kingdom is altogether out of the kingdom, and there out are dogs and demons, blackness and darkness forever. And within are life, light, glory, music, Jesus, heaven. O, come in! Come in, for Jesus' sake.

LIKE almost all the ancient peoples of the East, the Javanese have very strongly marked superstions, one of the most peculiar of which is pictured in the illustration on this page. In the southern provces of Java and on the neighboring ilars, there are many Brahmins, and the mains of Brahminism on the island are ffiently numerous to show that at one me hat venerable faith ushave had a strong foot- ere.

O of the great Brahmin sti is in Java is devoted to ership of the Bromo, a remy so-called because, certain day in October, e votees gather in great mrs around the crater of ost extinct volcano, to avnd worship and offer cres to a supposed spirit at vells within the moun- in. Only an insignificant f the volcano is now ti but the disturbance is ou to emit groans and is that seem to startle and erve the assemblages. siresiding genius, who is ped to be hidden in the co is known as the Pun- ro Gunong, or keeper of e mountain. To appease mruit and poultry are of- d abundance and occa- my, when the volcanic is are unusually loud, the petitious Brahmins de- reat the evil spirit is call- r human flesh and is be appeased with the aughter of the lower ins. The Bromo, in the eastern part tisland, is in the very heart of a vol- ni region, for all around may be seen ne volcanoes, some extinct and others ti an active state. Near Tosari, fif- les distant, the Bromo's mutterings nblings are distinctly heard.

Wing of a pilgrimage to the Bromo, e correspondent of the London "Graphic" ys "The earth on each side was com- seof clay and sand, veined with lines lk, and as we approached 'the floor' is anged to charred stone, gravel, and nds. We set our ponies, which resem- ed ild Arabs, over a sandy desert at full ee and in a short time reached a spot ota mile from the actual Bromo, or ac- ve olcano, from which issued dense no , and a wild, deafening noise. At is ot we saw a large number of people sse bled in groups, who were eating and ay g, or chatting, laughing, and sing- g. In the crowd walked the Wodones nd antries—that is, heads of small villa- es districts—gaily dressed, with their un hed kresses glittering amid the folds f ir sarongs, or large piece of colored lk anging over the skirt from the waist; hi behind each was seen a small retinue, om carrying long spears and one of the bore a large gilt umbrella. There re also Arab vendors of amulets, charms, nd als of dye for the eyelids and for the ail. A large space was devoted to the ffe gs, chiefly of fruit, hung on wooden tas, and baskets of poultry, and on one ide vere spread about twenty mats, on whi were patriarchal and juvenile-looking priests, kneeling in the Arab fashion, their bodies partly resting on the calves of their legs. Behind each priest sat a boy holding a payong or umbrella. At given signals, the crowd gathered before the priests and laid down their offerings with prayers and adoration, after which each priest dipped his bundle of flowers into the 'holy-water' which he sprinkled on the fruits offered by the faithful. Then with a mighty roar 'Ayo! Ayo! Bromo!' (Forward to the volcano!) the immense mass of human beings moved swiftly forward to the mountain. All shared the same conviction, viz:—that the first to reach the goal is sure to be favored by fortune. Through sandy slopes, sinking ankle deep, and over rocky ridges under a blazing sun, the crater is at last gained. At the summit prayers are said, after which the offerings are hurled into the crater and the ceremony is over. The people descend to the plain and amuse themselves at games, feats of strength and scrambling for chickens."

THE WORSHIP OF THE BROMO IN HEATHEN JAVA.

This is probably the only place in the world where such a spectacle can still be seen. Volcano-worship, formerly common enough in tropical countries, is now fortunately almost unknown owing to the spread of Gospel light and truth. In Java, however, the great mass of the people have a very rude belief, akin to that of the earlier creeds of India. Every village has its own patron saint, with an altar under some spreading tree. Every field, each separate kind of grain, the children, riches, poverty, disease, health, all have their particular spirits. The whole life of the Javanese is a mass of mysteries.

Missionary work is carried on in Java by the Netherlands Mission Society, Dutch Baptist Society, Netherlands Union, Mennonite Society, Christian Reformed Church and Dutch Missionary Society. There are about 15,000 nominal Christians in Java.

A Savage Idea of Dress.

Many years ago, when a now world-renowned pioneer missionary and his wife reached their field, she wore what was fashionable then, a hoop-skirt. She was the first foreign woman probably ever seen by the curious natives, and they gathered to study this new and wonderful curiosity. After gazing at her from a distance, and asking each other a multitude of questions, they approached closer, and eyed her with amazement that had not enough words for use. Finally they asked, through an interpreter, of her husband as they pointed to the immense skirts below the small waist, arms and head:

"Is that all woman?"

Not until allowed to examine the dress were they convinced that it was not.

Quietness in Dress.

To be well dressed it is not necessary that a young man should be flashily or expensively clad. Let him remember that his strongest recommendation in many quarters is respectability. Some young men, apparently successful, may be flashy and loud in dress and manner, and disrespectful to women and sacred things. But the young man who is respectable always wears best. The way a young man carries himself in private life ofttimes means much to him in his business career. No matter where he is, or in whose company, respectability and all that it implies, will always command respect.

Making Children "Mind."

By some parents, the art of "making a child mind" is considered a desirable one, and the same view is held by many others, including teachers. Now, there are two ways of making the little folks "mind"—which is simply another word for "immediate obedience." Does the child obey your command with a cheerful spirit and with a loving look in its eyes? Does it show a desire from day to day to help and to please you in little things? If so, your guidance is in the right direction. Point out attractive ways in which the child may find pleasure in doing right. Call out by conversation with it the child's idea of right and wrong in things that transpire both in its home and school life. Call out its childish judgment and respect it, too. Thus, you will soon find it a comparatively easy matter to make the children "mind."

The Thoughts of the Aged.

When the aged mind turns backward, as turn it will, let it be to "the hallowed quiets of the past," writes Harriet Beecher Stowe. Old age should be full of hope, not regret; it may be a blessing instead of a burden; a time of peace, not of unrest; a reminder and promise of the tranquil home in heaven. What is a good old age but one of God's blessings?

Oh, if old age were canceled from our lot,
Full soon would that unhallowed deed blot!
Life's busy day would want its tranquil even,
And earth would lose her stepping-stone to heaven.

God sometimes gives to good men and women a guileless and holy second childhood, in which the soul becomes childlike, not childish, and the faculties in full fruit and ripeness, are mellow, without sign of decay. This is the songful "land of Beulah," where they who have traveled manfully the Christian way abide awhile, to show the world a perfected manhood and womanhood.

TWO MOTHERS.

THE night came darkly down,
The bird—mother said:
"Peep! Peep!
You ought to be asleep.
'Tis time my little ones were safe in bed."
So, sheltered by her wing in downy nest,
The weary little birdlings took their rest.

The night came darkly down,
The baby's mother said:
"Bye low,
You musn't frolic so.
You should have been asleep an hour ago."
And, nestling closer to its mother's breast,
The merry prattler sank to quiet rest.

Then in the cradle soft
'Twas laid with tenderest care,
"Good night!
Sleep till the morning light,"
Whispered the mother as she breathed a prayer,
Night settled down, the gates of day were barred
And loving angels were on guard.

PUSS AND HER BEST FRIEND.

IF there is a spark of pride or gratitude in the feline nature it ought to show itself toward a quiet, little, middle-aged Frenchwoman, named Mrs. Henriette Ronner, who has done for the cat what Rosa Bonheur did for the horse, and Sir Edwin Landseer for the dog race. In hundreds of years, only four artists have painted cats well — three men, Gottfried Mind, a Swiss; Hokusai, a Japanese; Louis Eugene Lambert, a Frenchman, and Mrs. Ronner, of Holland. Her father was a painter, who lost his sight. He was her first trainer. Some of her early drawings made, when a child of five, are still in existence, and show the talent that was inherent. By means of long talks her father taught her for what she was to look in nature, and how to transcribe it on canvas. Animal life, was most attractive to the child, and in her long days of outdoor rural work she devoted more and more time and attention to the portrayal of animals. At sixteen she exhibited her first picture at Duesseldorf. The picture was of a cat in a window. Its prompt sale determined the girl artist to persevere in her chosen field, and after this time (1837) she was a frequent and constant contributor of animal portraits and studies to the exhibitions of Germany and Holland. Mme. Ronner's most remarkable picture was a canvas, entitled, "The Friend of Man" and represented an old sand-seller weeping over the death of one of his little draft-dogs, while two other dogs look with dumb sympathy at their comrade and their master. Since that time she has charmed the artistic world and multitudes of other people by her "cat-pictures." Cats and kittens in every conceivable pose, in sport and in mischief, indoors and outdoors, gray, tortoise-shell, mouse-colored, black and white, have been felicitously portrayed by her brush and other artists have despaired of competing in her particular field. She has won both fame and fortune through these remarkable "cat-pictures."

The Minister's Wife.

We do not, as a rule, give the minister's wife proper credit for all the good she is capable of accomplishing, and which she often does accomplish. Nowadays, far more than in the past, she shares with her husband the ordeal of standing in "that fierce light which beats upon the throne." She is not permitted to minister only to her own home; she must be an angel of mercy and help to a hundred homes. She must share with her husband the cares of many other parents. To all she is not only to be an example of modest yet positive womanly virtue, but she is to be an inspiration and a comfort to the weary, the disheartened and the lonely. Surely we ought to do all that lies in our power to help her and cheer her on her way!

An Ounce of Prevention is cheaper than any quantity of cure. Don't give children narcotics or sedatives. They are unnecessary when the infant is properly nourished, as it will be if brought up on the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.

The Gospel Among the Pines.

Miss Nason's Work for Christ Among the Lumbermen and Miners of Michigan and Wisconsin—A Brave Christian Woman.

IN these days of active Christianity, when the progress of the Gospel is visible on every side, it is pleasant to have an opportunity to take note of the efforts of the humbler laborers in the Master's vineyard. Unlike those who work in the sight of the whole world, their efforts are known probably by only a few, outside of those persons with whom they come into actual contact; but they are none the less appreciated by Him who holds the smallest sacrifice of his servants for His sake as very precious indeed.

MISS EMMA NASON, CHRISTIAN WORKER.

Such a quiet, unpretentious worker for Christ is Miss Emma Nason, whose photograph appears on this page. For the sake of others, and in order that souls might be won from darkness to light, she has left the world behind and gone forth, full of zeal and trust, to the lonely hills and pine forests of the Northwest to carry the message of salvation to the lumbermen who dwell there. Miss Nason's work among the lumbermen and miners began in 1889, in Hurley, a mining town of Wisconsin, which had become a hot-bed of dissipation. The reports of the dreadful iniquity of the place led her to decide upon it as her field of effort. At first the work was hedged about by many difficulties; but soon the sympathies of good Christian people were interested and the funds came for the support and prosecution of the mission. There were many ultimately rescued through the humble effort thus put forth. Gamblers and drunkards were among the number. As it afterwards proved, the work at Hurley, far from exhausting the consecrated energies of Miss Nason, only served to urge her to still wider efforts in other fields.

In the great Wisconsin pineries, there are scattered thousands of woodsmen who, during a large part of the year, are practically isolated. Their lives are almost cut off from connection with civilized communities and they have practically no social or religious privileges. It was a field wide enough for the combined energies of a score or more mission workers and evangelists, and its was almost unoccupied. Miss Nason resolved to dedicate her life to spreading the Gospel among those benighted and neglected people.

Miss Nason's work has not been wholly unattended by danger. An attempt was made on Jan. 21, to blow up the house at Sault St. Marie, in which she had so long carried on a beneficent work of rescue among the wives and daughters of the lumbermen. A stick of dynamite was placed under the porch with a fuse attached. Miss Nason had just left the porch and had gone to her writing-room when the explossion occurred. It is believed that the intention was to destroy the house and kill all the inmates, especially Mr. Whittaker, who had succeeded in closing many of the worst places of vice that formerly thrived on the earnings of the lumbermen. Happily, the vindictive men were clumsy at their work, and did not get the dynamite far enough under the house to accomplish their purpose, but succeeded only in destroying the porch and breaking all the windows in the front of the house.

Miss Nason, it was supposed, would be terrified by the outrage and discontinue her work, but she determined to go on. She wrote to her sisters in the King's Daughters: "In the awful danger through which we have just passed, surely our King has guarded us and has wonderfully preserved life. Will not the same Almighty Hand send us the help so much needed to carry on successfully this battle against terrible wrong? We are praying for God's overruling power amid the greatest trials."

This fortunately was the only instance of the kind in her long experience and it won for her more friends and a deeper sympathy than ever. And so this godly woman, beloved of all, continues to uplift the Cross among the dwellers of the Northern forests and to bring many precious souls into the kingdom of Christ.

Miss Emma C. Nason, the oldest daughter of Rev. John Nason, was born in Woodstock, Madison Co., N.Y., July 31, 1843. While yet a little girl she became a Christian, and while still very young she was deeply interested in philanthropic projects, and especially in the "Home for the Friendless." Many boxes and barrels of clothing and bedding were sent to that institution through her efforts. She was also of a literary turn, and wrote a series of articles on the lives of the mothers of great and good men; besides many other contributions and some poems of unusual merit. Later she became a member of the order of King's Daughters, and, through that organization became interested in Christian work among the neglected lumbermen, miners, and boatmen of the Northwest.

Two years ago, after the death of her parents, she removed to Sault St. Marie, Mich., where she had for two years had a mission. To the regular missionary work and the distribution of lumbermen, miners and sailors' supplies, she has also added a Rescue Mission for girls. Wonderful have been the changes wrought in the lives of many through her instrumentality. Receiving no salary, she devotes all her time and income to the work; and at times in the exigencies that have arisen, she has been compelled to borrow money to carry it forward.

A Valuable Book.

It is not generally known, but it is a fact recognized by physicians, that a very large majority of the diseases of mankind begin with irritation and inflammation in that part of the body which becomes affected by the disease. Inflammation is an unhealthy condition of the tissues, manifested externally by heat, redness and swelling, internally by congestion of the blood vessels, causing pain, disease and growth of unsound tissue. It is very important that every person should understand the nature and home treatment of inflammations. For this purpose, I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston, Mass., have had compiled from the highest medical authorities for family use, an illustrated book, entitled "TREATMENT FOR DISEASES." The book contains a description of all ailments caused by or accompanied with inflammation, alphabetically arranged; also the treatment for such. The book is printed in plain, simple language that all can understand. It is a valuable and complete treatise which everyone should have for ready reference. The publishers will send one copy in paper covers, to any person on receipt of their name and address and a two cent stamp for postage. I. S. JOHNSON & Co., 22 Custom House St., Boston

GREAT SCIENTIST GONE.

In the death of Prof. Louis Pasteur, the distinguished chemist and experimenter, which occurred at St. Cloud, near Paris, a few days ago, the world has suffered a distinct loss. Pasteur was one of the few men who made a profession on the age in which he lived, whose rich talents were consecrated to the benefit of his fellow-men.

He was born at Dole, France, in 1822, his father being a tanner. At school and college he made no special mark, but when, with the ardor of a youthful student, he entered the study of chemistry, his remarkable aptitude showed itself in the rapidity with which he mastered the most difficult problems. At the close of his educational course he was easily the leading chemist of his age in France, if not in all Europe.

Nearly three decades have passed since the scientific world was startled by Pasteur's new theory (since then abundantly corroborated) that many diseases common to man and animals were caused by the presence of parasites, or bacilli. This discovery practically dated from the great chemist's experiments about 1865, in connection with a plague which was threatening to exterminate the silk worms and destroy the silk industry in France. Continuing his investigations, he practically revolutionized the ideas and conclusions which the world of science had long accepted regarding the origin of certain diseases, and the method of treatment. His greatest discovery—the treatment of hydrophobia by the injection of a virus calculated to counteract or wholly prevent the disease—has already stood the test of many years' experience. It is so well known that it need not be described here. So widely is the principle of inoculation for hydrophobia recognized that Pasteur Institutes are now found in many large cities in different parts of the world, and even where no institute exists, the Pasteur method is very generally adopted by the medical department of many cities and towns on both sides of the Atlantic.

The following remarkable statement to which we direct special attention, is from a Tenn. farmer.

My age is 65. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 yrs., dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing, and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Every thing I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

WORDS UNSAID.

Out of sight and hearing they go—
These close, familiar friends who loved us so;
And sitting in the shadow they have left,
Alone with loneliness, and sore bereft,
We think, with vain regret, of some fond word
That once we might have said, and they have heard.

THE JEWS OF INDIA.

In a letter recently published in the Times of India," this interesting statement appears: "The Jews of India consist of many communities, the chief of which are the Bagdadi Jews, Cochin Jews, and Beni-Israel Jews. Besides these three communities, there are Jews from England, Italy, Germany and France who, owing to the paucity of their numbers, cannot be ranked as communities. The Bagdadi Jews do not make any distinction between those Jews born purely of Jewish parents and those born of alien mothers. The Cochin Jews and the Beni-Israel do make this distinction; those born of purely Jewish mothers being called 'White' Jews and 'White' Israels, while those born of alien mothers are called 'Black' Jews and 'Black' Israels.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

NATURE'S MATERIA MEDICA.

TRADE MARK REGISTERED.

Spring No. 2. Nature's Anti-Dyspeptic, Anti-Malarial Water—Its Value in Uric-Acid Trouble. The Best Table Water.

Dr. ROBERTS BARTHOLOW, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Materia Medica and General Therapeutics in the Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, etc.: "The Buffalo Lithia Water is the best table water known to me: and I have some experience of them all."

Rev. MOSES A. HOGE, D.D., of the Synod of Virginia, Richmond, Va.: "I have for some time made use of no water for drinking purposes but Buffalo Lithia Water No. 2, and since using it I have enjoyed the best health of my life."

Hon. ROGER A. PRYOR, New York:
"I have been so essentially benefitted by the use of your

that I feel it my duty, with your permission, to make formal acknowledgment of my obligation to you.

"For many years I have suffered severely from Dyspepsia and Insomnia, but after drinking the Water for six months I found myself entirely relieved of these painful maladies. To no other cause besides the use of the Water can I attribute my recovery, nor do I know of any auxiliary agent that conduced to my cure.

"I am inclined to think that I am mainly indebted to the Water No. 2. I may add that several gentlemen here of my acquaintance concur in my estimate of the salutary efficacy of the Buffalo Lithia Water."

Hon. DANIEL E. SICKLES, New York:
"By the advice of my physician I have used

for Dyspepsia and Uric-Acid trouble, and with decidedly beneficial results."

Hon. ROSCOE CONKLING, New York:
"Buffalo Lithia Water was first brought to my notice last year while suffering from severe MALARIAL DISORDER. I say 'MALARIAL' because the doctors said so. After trying other remedies, without benefit, I found prompt relief from the Water; and when there has been any return of my unpleasant symptoms it has always relieved me. Several to whom I have recommended it make like favorable report of it. I am a strong believer in its power as an ANTIDOTE to the ACIDS, which it neutralizes. I have pleasure in saying this, and shall continue to advice my neighbors and acquaintances to try the Water."

is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one half-gallon bottles, $5.00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent FREE to any address.

BY "JACOB'S WELL."

The Historic Spring near Sychar, in Samaria, where the Patriarchs Watered their Flocks—The Scene of Christ's Conversation with the Woman of Samaria.

A LITTLE over a mile south of the city of Nablous, or ancient Shechem, and at the entrance to the valley that lies between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim, is the historic well shown in the photo-graph. About its identity as the well built by Jacob, the patriarch, there is not a reasonable doubt; for its location, its surroundings and an unbroken chain of tradition, all tend to prove its genuineness. Over the well there formerly stood a church, built in the fourth century, but probably demolished during the Crusades. Part of the ruined pillars and walls still remain. Although the well, too, has long since fallen into decay, there are many of the stones plainly in view that may have been laid in the patriarchal days, and which have been utilized from time to time in making repairs. Originally, the well was probably between one hundred and one hundred and fifty feet in depth, and it was fed by springs, of which there are indications in the immediate vicinity; but its crumbling walls have gradually strewn layer upon layer of dirt upon its bottom until now the depth is hardly seventy-five feet. The coping has fallen to pieces and weeds and grass grow rank around the top of the well. Travelers often step aside from the highway to inspect it, and out of curiosity they drop pebbles into it and listen to hear them strike the dry, stony bottom. Yet old and dilapidated and useless as it really is, the well is very dear to the natives of Palestine, who venerate it as an enduring memorial of the patriarch Jacob, by whom it was dug, while he dwelt nearby. (Gen. 33: 18, and John 4: 8, 28.) To the Christian, the old well stands as a reminder of one of the most remarkable passages in the life of the Saviour. Here Jesus met the woman of Samaria, who came thither to draw water. Sinful and totally indifferent to all that related to the spiritual life, she presented the greatest contrast to the Holy One who greeted her with the request, "Give me to drink." In the conversation that followed, the Saviour led her, by simple and natural stages, to realize the wickedness of her life. And when at last her eyes were opened, and she knew that he with whom she talked was divine, her overflowing heart, unable longer to contain the secret, found relief in proclaiming the Messiah's presence to others. One can picture in imagination the group of astonished disciples approaching the well and discovering the Master in converse with a creature so fallen, that most men would hesitate even to speak to her. But the great, loving heart of Jesus had gone out in pity to the woman, as he sat by the well that day, and he knew that the flame that had lighted her soul would enkindle others. The evangelist relates that many of the Samaritans believed on him for the saying of the woman, and others, who came afterward, through her invitation, "believed because of his own word." The Samaritan Magdalen, who had tasted of the "living water," beside the well of Jacob, became in turn an evangelist to others, and through her repentance and conversion many were led to accept the truth.

THE TRADITIONAL WELL OF JACOB THE PATRIARCH, NEAR SYCHAR IN SAMARIA.

From a Photograph Brought from Palestine by the Proprietor of "The Christian Herald."

The language of the inspired narrative is in accord with the scene and its surroundings, and aids materially in the identification. At that point where the woman endeavored to turn the current of conversation from her own perilous spiritual state to the long-standing dispute between the Jews and the Samaritans, the Saviour uttered the memorable response: "Woman, believe me the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father" in the sense of such worship being exclusive. "God is a Spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." It is not difficult to believe that, even as he spoke, Jesus must have indicated by a movement of his divine hand, Mount Gerizim, upon whose height the Samaritans had their temple and from which the smoke of the sacrifice had ascended for generations before his advent.

Standing by the side of "Jacob's Well," or, it may be, resting on the broken granite pillars that once upheld the basilica which, in the days of Eusebius and the pious Empress Helene, enclosed the fountain, one finds within the range of vision several spots made famous in Bible history. Upon a somewhat lower level, several hundred feet to the north, and almost at the base of Mount Ebal, is the tomb of Joseph, where his body was laid after being removed from its Egyptian mausoleum at the time of the Exodus, as related in the book of Joshua. It was fitting that the bones of Pharaoh's great Minister should rest at last, not in the land wherein he was a distinguished alien, but in the ground that his father Jacob had bought of the sons of Hamor, prince of Shechem, and which he added, when dying, to the patrimony of his beloved son.

Sychar, the name given to ancient Shechem in the evangelist's day, and now known as Nablous, has an unequalled site, but like its general surroundings, the town itself has fallen into decay. What was in the time of Christ, a spot remarkable for its beauty and the centre of a splendid landscape is now a dilapidated and unimportant village. To the pilgrim, it revives Biblical memories of the time when Abraham built an altar under an oak near it, and when Jacob rested after his return from Mesopotamia. It was once a royal town where reigned Abimelech, the Shechemite king, and later it became a possession of the Levites

DISSIPATIONS OF THE RACE-COURSE.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Job 39: 19, 21, 25, "Hast thou given the horse strength? hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth: he goeth on to meet the armed men. He saith among the trumpets, ha, ha! and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting."

WE have recently had long columns of intelligence from the race-course, and multitudes flocked to the watering-places to witness equine competition, and there is lively discussion in all households about the right and wrong of such exhibitions of mettle and speed, and when there is a heresy abroad that the cultivation of a horse's fleetness is an iniquity instead of a commendable virtue—at such a time a sermon is demanded of every minister who would like to defend public morals on the one hand, and who is not willing to see an unrighteous abridgement of innocent amusement on the other. In this discussion I shall follow no sermonic precedent, but will give independently what I consider the Christian and common-sense view of this potent, all absorbing and agitating question of the turf.

There needs to be a redistribution of coronets among the brute creation. For ages the lion has been called the king of beasts. I knock off its coronet and put the crown upon the horse, in every way nobler, whether in shape, or spirit, or sagacity, or intelligence, or affection, or usefulness. He is semi-human, and knows how to reason on a small scale. The centaur of olden times, part horse and part man, seems to be a suggestion of the fact that the horse is something more than a beast. Job in my text sets forth his strength, his beauty, his majesty, the panting of his nostril, the pawing of his hoof, and his enthusiasm for the battle. What Rosa Bonheur did for the cattle, and what Landseer did for the dog, Job with mightier pencil does for the horse. Eighty-eight times does the Bible speak of him. He comes into every kingly procession, and into every great occasion, and into every triumph. It is very evident that Job, and David, and Isaiah, and Ezekiel, and Jeremiah, and John, were fond of the horse. He comes into much of their imagery. A red horse—that meant war. A black horse—that meant famine. A pale horse—that meant death. A white horse—that meant victory. Good Mordecai mounts him while Haman holds the bit. The Church's advance in the Bible is compared to a company of horses of Pharoah's chariot. Jeremian cries out, "How canst thou contend with horses?" Isaiah says, "The horse's hoofs shall be counted as flint." Miriam claps her cymbals and sings, "The horse and the rider hath he thrown into the sea." St. John describing Christ as coming forth from conquest to conquest represents him as seated on a white horse. In the parade of heaven the Bible makes us hear the clicking of hoofs on the golden pavement as it says, "The armies which were in heaven followed him on white horses." I should not wonder if the horse, so banged, and bruised, and beaten, and outraged on earth should have some other place where his wrongs shall be righted. I do not assert that, but I say I should not be surprised if, after all, St. John's descriptions of the horses in heaven turned out not altogether to be figurative, but somewhat literal.

As the Bible makes a favorite of the horse, the patriarch, and the prophet, and the evangelist, and the apostle stroking his sleek hide and patting his rounded neck, and tenderly lifting his exquisitely formed hoof, and listening with a thrill to the champ of his bit, so all great natures in all ages have spoken of him in encomiastic terms. Virgil in his Georgics almost seems to plagiarize from this description in the text, so much are the descriptions alike—the description of Virgil and the description of Job. The Duke of Wellington would not allow anyone irreverently to touch his old war-horse Copenhagen, on whom he had ridden fifteen hours without dismounting at Waterloo, and when old Copenhagen died, his master ordered a military salute fired over his grave. John Howard showed that he did not exhaust all his sympathies in pitying the human race, for when sick he writes home, "Has my old chaise horse become sick or spoiled?" There is hardly any passage of French literature more pathetic than the lamentation over the death of the war-charger, Marchegay. Walter Scott has so much admiration for this divinely honored creature of God that in "St. Ronan's Well" he orders the girth slackened and the blanket thrown over the smoking flanks. Edmund Burke, walking in the park at Beaconsfield, musing over the past, throws his arms around the worn-out horse of his dead son Richard, and weeps upon the horse's neck, the horse seeming to sympathize in the memories. Rowland Hill, the great English preacher, was caricatured because in his family prayers he supplicated for the recovery of a sick horse, but when the horse got well, contrary to all the prophecies of the farriers, the prayer did not seem quite so much of an absurdity.

But what shall I say of the maltreatment of this beautiful and wonderful creature of God? If Thomas Chalmers in his day felt called upon to preach a sermon against cruelty to animals, how much more in this day is there a need of reprehensive discourse. All honor to the memory of Professor Bergh, the chief apostle for the brute creation, for the mercy he demanded and achieved for this king of beasts. A man who owned four thousand horses, and some say forty thousand, wrote in the Bible: "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast." Sir Henry Lawrence's care of the horse was beautifully Christian. He says: "I expect we shall lose Conrad, though I have taken so much care of him that he may come in cool. I always walk him the last four or five miles, and as I walk myself the first hour, it is only in the middle of the journey we get over the ground." The Ettrick Shepherd in his matchless Ambrosial Nights speaks of the maltreatment of the horse as a practical blasphemy. I do not believe in the transmigration of souls, but I cannot very severely denounce the idea, for when I see men who cut and bruise and whack and welt and strike and maul and outrage and insult the horse, that beautiful servant of the human race, who carries our burdens and pulls our ploughs, and turns our threshers and our mills, and runs for our doctors—when I see men thus beating and abusing and outraging that creature, it seems to me that it would be only fair that the doctrine of transmigration of souls should prove true, and that for their punishment they should pass over into some poor miserable brute and be beaten and whacked and cruelly treated, and frozen and heated and over-driven; into an everlasting stage-horse, an eternal traveler on a towpath, or tied to an eternal post, in an eternal winter, smitten with eternal epizootics! Oh, is it not a shame that the brute creation, which had the first possession of our world, should be so maltreated by the race that came in last—the fowl and the fish created on the fifth day, the horse and the cattle created on the morning of the sixth day, and the human race not created until the evening of the sixth day? It ought to be that if any man overdrives a horse, or feeds him when he is hot, or recklessly drives a nail into the quick of his hoof, or rowels him to see him prance, or so shoes him that his fetlocks drop blood, or puts a collar on a raw neck, or unnecessarily clutches his tongue with a twisted bit, or cuts off his hair until he has no defence against the cold, or unmercifully abbreviates the natural defence against insectile annoyance—that such a man as that himself ought to be made to pull and let his horse ride!

But not only do our humanity and our Christian principle and the dictates of God demand that we kindly treat the brute creation, and especially the horse; but I go further, and say that whatever can be done for the development of his fleetness and his strength and his majesty ought to be done. We need to study his anatomy and his adaptations. I am glad that large books have been written to show how he can be best managed, and how his ailments can be cured, and what his usefulness is, and what his capacities are. It would be a shame if in this age of the world, when the florist has turned the thin flower of the wood into a gorgeous rose, and the pomologist has changed the acrid and gnarled fruit of the ancients into the very poetry of pear, and peach, and plum, and grape, and apple, and the snarling cur of the Orient has become the great mastiff, and the miserable creature of the olden times barnyard has become the Devonshire, and the Alderney, and the Shorthorn, that the horse, grander than them all, should get no advantage from our science, or our civilization, or our Christianity. Groomed to the last point of soft brilliance, his flowing mane a billow of beauty, his arched neck in utmost rhythm of curve, let him be harnessed in graceful trappings and then driven to the furthest goal of excellence, and then fed at luxuriant oat-bins, and blanketed in comfortable stall. The long tried and faithful servant of the human race deserves all kindness, all care, all reward, all succulent forage and soft litter and paradisiacal pasture field. Those farms in Kentucky and in different parts of the North, where the horse is trained to perfection in fleetness and in beauty and in majesty, are well set apart. There is no more virtue in driving slow than in driving fast, any more than a freight train going ten miles the hour is better than an express train going fifty. There is a delusion abroad in the world that a thing must be necessarily good and Christian if it is slow and dull and plodding. There are very few good people who seem to imagine it is humbly pious to drive a spavined, galled, glandered, spring-halted, blind-staggered jade. There is not so much virtue in a Rosinante as in a Bucephalus. We want swifter horses, and swifter men, and swifter enterprises, and the Church of God needs to get off its jog trot. Quick tempests, quick lightnings, quick streams; why not quick horses? In the time of war the cavalry service does the most execution, and as the battles of the world are probably not all past, our Christian patriotism demands that we be interested in equinal velocity. We might as well have poorer guns in our arsenals and clumsier ships in our navy-yards than other nations, as to have under our calvary saddles and before our parks of artillery slower horses. From the battle of Granicus, where the Persian horses drove the Macedonian infantry into the river, clear down to the horses on which Philip Sheridan and Stonewall Jackson rode into the fray, this animal of the military service has been recognized. Hamilcar, Hannibal, Gustavus Adolphus, Marshal Ney were cavalrymen. In this arm of the service, Charles Martel and the battle of Poitiers beat back the Arab invasion. The Carthaginian cavalry, with the loss of only seven hundred men, overthrew the Roman army with the loss of seventy thousand. In the same way the Spanish chivalry drove back the Moorish hosts. The best way to keep peace in this country and in all countries is to be prepared for war, and there is no success in such a contest unless there be plenty of light-footed chargers. Our Christian patriotism and our instruction from the Word of God demand that first of all we kindly treat the horse, and then after that, that we develop his fleetness and his grandeur and his majesty and his strength.

But what shall I say of the effort made in this day on a large scale to this splendid creature of God, this divinely honored being, an instrument of atrocious evil? I make no indiscriminate assault against the turf. I believe in the turf that can be conducted on right principles and with no betting. There is no more harm in offering a prize for the swiftest horse than there is harm at an agricultural fair in offering a prize to the farmer who has the best wheat, or to the fruit-grower who has the largest pear, or to the machinist who presents the best corn-thresher, or to a school offering a prize of a copy of Shakespeare to the best reader, or in a household giving a lump of sugar to the best behaved youngster. Prizes by all means, rewards by all means. That is the way God develops the race. Rewards for all kinds of well-doing. Heaven itself is called a prize: "The prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." So what is right in one direction is right in another direction. And without the prizes the horse's fleetness and beauty and strength will never be fully developed. If it cost $1000 or $50 or $10,000, and the result be achieved, is cheap. But the sin begins where the betting begins, for that is gambling, the effort to get that for which you give no equivalent, and gambling, whether on a large scale or a small scale, ought to be denounced of men as it will be accursed of God. If you have won fifty cents or 000 as a wager, you had better get rid of it. Get rid of it right away. Give it to some one who lost in a bet, or give it to some great reformatory institution, or if you do not like that, go down to the river and pitch it off the docks. You cannot afford to keep it. It will burn a hole in your purse, it will burn a hole in your estate, and you will lose all that, perhaps ten thousand times more—perhaps you will lose all. Gambling blasts a man or it blasts his children. Generally both and all.

What a spectacle when at Saratoga, or at Long Branch, or at Brighton Beach, or at Sheepshead Bay, the horses start, and in a flash fifty or a hundred thousand dollars change hands! Multitudes ruined by losing the bet, others worse ruined by winning the bet; for if a man lose in a bet on a horse-race, he may be discouraged and quit, but if he win the bet he is very apt to go straight on to hell!

An intimate friend, a journalist, who in the line of his profession investigates the evil, tells me that there are three different kinds of betting at horse-races, and they are about equally leprous: by "the pools," by "French mutuals," by what is called "bookmaking"—all gambling, bad, all rotten with iniquity. There is one word that needs to be written on the brow of every poolseller as he sits deducting his three or five per cent., and slyly "going up" more tickets than were sold for the winning horse—a word to be written also on the brow of every bookkeeper who at a inducement scratches a horse off of t race, and on the brow of every jockey o slackens pace that, according to agree- nt, another may win, and written over e y judge's stand, and written on every b d of the surrounding fences. That v d is, "swindle!" Yet thousands bet. l yers bet. Judges of courts bet. Mem- b s of the Legislature bet. Members of C ngress bet. Professors of religion bet. T chers and superintendents of Sunday S ools, I am told, bet. Ladies bet, not d ctly, but through agents. Yesterday, a every day they bet, they gain, they l e, and this season, while the parasols s ng and the hands clap and the huzzas d fen, there will be a multitude of people c pled, and deceived, and cheated, who will a the races go neck and neck, neck and n k to perdition. Cultivate the horse, by a means, drive him as fast as you desire, p vided you do not injure him or endan- g yourself or others; but be careful d not harness the horse to the chariot o in. Do not throw your jewels of mor- a y under the flying hoof. Do not under t pretext of improving the horse destroy a an. Do not have your name put down in the ever-increasing catalogue of those w o are ruined for both worlds by the dis- s tions of the American race-course. They say that an honest race-course is a "straight" track, and that a dishonest ra e-course is a "crooked" track—that is t parlance abroad; but I tell you that e y race-track, surrounded by betting m n and betting women, and betting cus- t is, is a straight track—I mean straight d wn! Christ asked in one of his Gos- p s: "Is not a man better than a sheep?" N ay, yes, and he is better than all the s ds that with lathered flanks ever shot a ound the ring at a race-course. That is a v y poor job by which a man in order to g a horse to come out a full length ahead o some other racer, so lames his own mor- a that he comes out a whole length behind i he race set before him.

Do you not realize the fact that there is a r ghty effort on all sides to-day to get money w thout earning it? That is the curse of all t cities; it is the curse of America—the ef- f t to get money without earning it, and as l er forms of stealing are not respectable, t y go into these gambling practices. I p ach this sermon on square old-fashioned h esty. I have said nothing against the h se, I have said nothing against the turf. I ave said everything against their prosti- t ion. Young men, you go into straightfor- w d industries and you will have better live- l od, and you will have larger permanent s cess than you can ever get by a wager; b t you get in with some of the whiskey, s n-blotched crew which I see going down t the boulevards, though I never bet, I w ll risk this wager, five million to nothing, y u will be debauched and damned. Cul- t ate the horse, own him if you can afford t own him, test all the speed he has, if he h ve any speed in him; but be careful w ich way you drive. You cannot always t l what direction a man is driving in by t e way his horses head. In my boyhood, I rode three miles every Sabbath morn- g to the country church. We were drawn b two fine horses. My father drove. He k ew them, and they knew him. They w re friends. Sometimes they loved to go r pidly, and he did not interfere with their h ppiness. He had all of us in the wagon w th him. He drove to the country church. T e fact is, that for eighty-two years he h ve in the same direction. The roan span a t I speak of was long ago unhitched, a d the driver put up his whip in the w agon-house never again to take it down; b t in those good old times I learned some- t ing that I never forgot, that a man may a mire a horse and love a horse, and be p oud of a horse, and not always be willing t take the dust of the preceding vehicle, a d yet be a Christian, an earnest Chris- t an, an humble Christian, a consecrated C hristian, useful until the last, so that at h s death the Church of God cries out as E isha exclaimed when Elijah went up with c alloping horses of fire: "My father, my f ther, the chariots of Israel and the horse- m en thereof!"

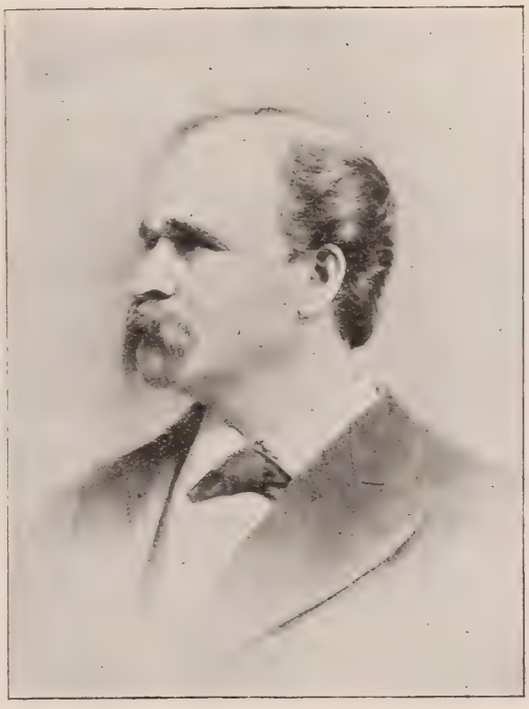
A Noble Life Ended.

The Christian Career of Mr. L. P. Tibbals—A life-long Philanthropist and Friend of Missions.

FEW men were better known, in a quiet and unostentatious way, by a very large circle of Christian people, than Mr. L. P. Tibbals, who died in New York recently. He was born at Milford, Conn., in 1832, and came to New York when a mere lad and commenced life as an errand boy in a store. His educational opportunities were meagre, but he profited by them. After a business venture in a millinery store he embarked in the toy business at 820 Broadway, and continued in it during the rest of his life. While a member of the Volunteer Fire Department he had a very miraculous escape from death. His leg was broken, and the injury troubled him all his life, and ultimately caused his death. While at the funeral of a friend who was killed while saving a lady from being run over, he concluded to become a Christian.

From that time forward, he took a keen and active personal interest in church work, and was connected with many godly enterprises. He was identified with the Bowery Mission, from the first inception and supplied the money that was needed to begin the work.

Mr. Tibbals was the originator of the modern improved cheap lodging-houses in the Bowery. He was pained, one winter night when in the neighborhood of Cherry street, to witness the way in which unfortunate people seeking a night's shelter were treated. Standing in a line before the door in the snow, they had to wait their turn. Some could not be admitted for lack of room. The accommodation was meagre and dirty, and no measures were taken to secure decency, order or safety. There were frequent rows and violent scenes. He opened a house at No. 280 Bowery, made it clean and furnished it. It cost him about a thousand dollars. He did it purely from philanthropic motives, and did not expect to make a profit. He placed it in charge of Mr. S. H. Hadley, the well-known evangelist, with the general instruction to help the men, give them Christian counsel, and treat them with kindness. The investment proved a sound one, and one house after another opened, until there were seven running, and all full and paying. All the employees were men who had come to the lodging-houses out of work. They were aided by converts from the Water Street Mission.



THE LATE MR. L. P. TIBBALS.

Mr. Tibbals disposed of his toy business seven years ago, and after that time devoted his energies very largely to Christian work. He gave liberally to many worthy schemes of a Gospel character, and was a staunch patron of many Christian and philanthropic institutions. Among a multitude of other beneficences a few may be mentioned. He gave $2,000 for the establishment of a Gospel Wagon for the Christian Workers Association; he aided in the establishment of a permanent Gospel mission in Bnffalo, advancing the money to Col. H. H. Hadley for that purpose. He was a patron and supporter of the Good Will Farm for Reforming Wayward Boys at Fairfield, Me., a contributor to the Door of Hope Mission Home for Girls in New York, and a warm friend of the work of the Florence Mission. He had a strong belief in the efficacy of tracts as a means of Gospel work, and printed and distributed great quantities. He was a warm advocate of temperance. One of his prominent characteristics was a love of children, and he was never happier than when surrounded by the little folks and talking with them.

Mr. Tibbals loved to do quiet missionary work, in a way that attracted no attention, but was usually productive of much good. His death will bring sorrow to many hearts. To many he proved a friend in need, to others he was a wise spiritual counselor and by all who knew him he was loved and respected as a consistent Christian and a zealous servant of the Master.

MOURNED THEIR SON AS LOST.

When the son of a Brahmin or Mohammedan becomes a convert to Christianity, he is mourned by his parents and friends as though he were actually dead. A wedding was solemnized in Bombay recently, in which the bridegroom was the son of a Brahmin, and the bride the daughter of a Mohammedan, and both had become sincere believers in Christ. The bridegroom, Samuel Subha Rao, was brought to Christ seven years ago under the teaching of Miss Reade, of the South Arcot Mission. After his baptism his parents brought a suit against Miss Reade for the loss of their son, as they considered his conversion equivalent to his death. It involved her in a long and troublesome trial. This young man has now received his theological education. Returning to Miss Reade after his education, he became her valuable assistant in preaching the Gospel throughout the district. In the meanwhile there had been another conversion in Miss Reade's school. This was a Mohammedan girl named Rokia Bi, and she, too, had been educated with a specal view to mission service. When, a few months ago, Samnel asked for marriage with Rokia Bi, it was felt to be from the Lord. As the bridegroom and bride were united in Christian marriage in the presence of the little company, including Christians who had come out from various races and castes, one realized how true it is that "in Christ Jesus" we are all one.

A CHINESE PREACHER'S SERMON.

The disastrous war with Japan has made the Chinese think of the causes of their humiliation. Though hesitating to speak in public, they are free, in private, to declare their opinions. Few, however, are willing to speak as frankly as a native preacher did recently in Southern China. Taking as a text: "All things new," he applied it to his country. He said that the nation had for ages prized antiquity and forgotten the future. It had lived as though it hoped some day to return to the past, and ignored the fact that it was leaving that past farther and farther behind, in the progress to a very different future. If China is to become worthy of a glorious career, she must turn her face forward and keep her feet moving that way too. The past suffices for lessons, not for devotion or imitation. Even though a golden age cannot be gained, it is better to have one of silver, if real, rather than of gold that is only a dream.

CHRISTIAN CONFLICT.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 3. "Our Enemies; our Weapons; Our Allies." Eph. 6: 10-18.

FROM whatever standpoint life is observed it resolves itself into a battle-field. There is a tendency in the present day to deny the existence of the evil spirits to which the Apostle refers in the passage which is the basis of the Topic; but even those who deny their existence cannot eliminate the idea of conflict from their conception of life. Man has enemies of an invisible, intangible kind and whether he calls them evil spirits, or evil principles, his position and his duty are the same. When some course of conduct is open to him which he is strongly inclined to take, because of the gratification that it promises to his physical nature—some opportunity to make money, or enjoy pleasure—and his calm reason, his higher nature, tells him that such a course is wrong, then there must be a struggle, and it matters not to him whether the suggestion to the evil comes from an evil spirit, or from his own nature and its propensities. Paul believed in the existence of "rulers of darkness," but his exhortation to prepare for and wage the battle against them comes with the same force to the man who does not believe in them, as to the man who does believe in them. Evil is here in a thousand forms and when it is suppressed or eradicated in one form, it rears its head in another shape and the battle has to be fought over again. Whether it appears as an institution, as a false doctrine, as a social custom, as a secret habit, or as an insidious temptation, it is an enemy and one that we must conquer or yield to. Neutrality is impossible. Each man has to choose for himself whether he will yield and become a slave, or fight to be a man. The battle is ever new, ever beginning, ever being urged, with success now on one side, now on the other. It is always individual and personal and almost the only benefit one man gains from the fact of its being universal, comes from the knowledge that the enemy is not invincible, that he has been conquered again and again and that he is being conquered now, on his right hand and on his left. This fact is a distinct encouragement to him, a stimulus of the most valuable kind. There is one other advantage from the knowledge, and that is that the struggler who is losing heart may learn from some brother who is a victor how he conquered and may at least have sympathy in his fight. But it is his own battle. In one form or another, evil comes to him with its chain, which it will throw around him if he does not prevent it.

Paul gives a summary of the equipment the fighter should have. This is important. How many pious fathers and mothers looking at their sons whom they are sending out into the world knowing that evil in some shape will assail them, but knowing not in what shape, wish that they could clothe them with an armor that nothing will penetrate! Paul's list follows the accoutrement of the soldier of his time and he spiritualizes each article. He should have truth like a girdle to give him strength; a hatred of lying and hypocrisy; righteousness in all his conduct to protect him from assault; the Gospel of peace to keep his feet out of the mire of worldly quarrels; faith as a shield that will not allow doubt to reach his heart, that will interpose a barrier of confidence in his Lord against all suggestions of infidelity and scepticism; salvation about his head and the knowledge of the Word of God in his hand for an aggressive weapon. And with all this a constant reliance on God himself, who has promised his alliance and support, and prayer to him for continual help, not for himself only, but for others in like case. Thus equipped he may go forth to conquer, assured of ultimate victory. Again and again he may stumble and fall, but the trend of his life will be ever upward to the end, and even from his defeats he will learn caution and vigilance.

SAMUEL THE JUDGE.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 3. I. Sam. 7: 5-15. Golden Text, I. Sam. 7: 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

TO be a true, just and wise judge of men, a man needs to stand in the closest relation to God who is the Judge of all. This even the heathen king Pharaoh perceived when he set Joseph over Egypt. This Nebuchadnezzar perceived when he set Daniel and his friends in high office in the province of Babylon. We have seen Samuel as the child, learning to listen to God; now we see him as the man, and can trace in his life the results of his having learned to listen. Men who have only learned this world's wisdom can judge only from the sight of their own eyes, or the hearing of their own ears. But when God prepares a judge as he prepared Samuel, by awakening in him a hearing heart, he gives him the benefit of his own all-seeing eyes and his own all-hearing ears; and thus it becomes everyone who is in office, more than all others, to wait upon the Lord.

God's first communication to Samuel regarding Eli's house had had its terrible fulfilment. The defection in the priesthood had had its sure effect upon the people, who, seeing Eli's sons guilty of sacrilege, themselves committed the same sin in attempting to force the hand of God to save them from the Philistines, by taking the ark of God into the camp. The guilty Hophni and Phineas were slain, and the ark of God taken; and for more than twenty years the tabernacle stood empty of its chief glory, the ark of the covenant of God, and its pillar of cloud and fire. It was in these days of that the Word of the Lord through Samuel came to all Israel (I. Sam. 4: 1). Even as a child he must bear the burden of the Lord, and take in to the full the situation of things around him as God would show them to him from his point of view. Separated unto God from his birth, called to be his prophet from his early boyhood, he must so live as to understand his God and to be his interpreter to the people. God had given many judges to Israel but none had been called just as Samuel had, and none had been so signally prepared as he. God brings out his brightest stars in the darkest nights.

The burden of the young prophet's ministry produced its effect: "All Israel lamented after the Lord." But mere lamentation can avail little if it is not followed by a repentance which forsakes sin. A continual regret that we are not what we should be, without making it the matter of our first consideration that we should no longer remain in an unsatisfactory condition, is sheer unreality, and most dishonoring to God, who only waits for our consent and co-operation, to make us what he would have us to be. Twenty years of this kind of lamentation was all the visible fruit which the young prophet and judge had of his ministry. With opened eyes he saw the cause of his God losing among the heathen, and God's people hanging a dead weight on him; none understood his God. But he saw well that things must come to a crisis. He had learned, no doubt, his own lessons of humility, and learned also to take deeply on his heart the cause of his God, but now a time for decisive action had arrived. "Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel and said, If ye do return unto the Lord with all your heart, then put away the strange gods and the Ashtaroth from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the Lord, and serve him only, and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines.

In some way Samuel, still quite a young man, must have arranged to have this message penetrate throughout the land. It was an appeal to Israel as a people. Probably the prophet had already done much in smaller circles, his influence may have been very great, but now he must appeal on behalf of his God to all Israel. "If ye do return unto the Lord with all your heart, then prove it by making sacrifice. Leave off fruitless laments after the Lord, he is no God of wood or stone which cannot hear. Put away that which dishonors him, be true to him and loyal, and so give him the opportunity of disposing of your enemies and proving to the heathen Philistines that he is God indeed. Samuel saw that if Israel were to be rightly governed, God must first be given his true place. It is so in every relation of life. If parents would govern their children aright, both parents and children must give God his place as supreme in family questions. Pupils, servants, workmen and workwomen can only be rightly governed when they and those who are over them, recognize God as indeed and only Supreme. There is an easy solution of all contradiction, strife and contention when God is given his true place in a house, a school, a workshop a kingdom, or a human heart.

It was no light matter for a young man to make such an appeal. If he had not been true in telling the vision to Eli (chap. 3: 15-18), his courage would probably have failed him now. One act of faithfulness prepares for and facilitates the next. One unfaithfulness leads on to repetitions of the same. God stood with his young servant and gave his true words power. It is not fluency, talent, nor education which give real power to a man's words; it is the measure of his Communion with his God.

Sometimes the most broken, ill-delivered, ignorant message has so gone home to our hearts that it has worked a change within us for eternity. God can afford to dispense with all our natural gifts, but he can never dispense with a true understanding of him which comes from continued communion with him. God gave his words power, idols and idolatrous practices were banished from the land, and the people served the Lord only. And Samuel said, "Gather all Israel to Mizpah, and I will pray for you unto the Lord." From his life of prayer and simple testimony Samuel was now to come forth as his people's leader; a reformer raised up of God. No one asked his authority; all Israel recognized it, and "gathered together to Mizpah, and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day and said: 'We have sinned against the Lord.'" When those who are contenting themselves with pious, vain regrets begin to put away that which offends God, and gather together to renounce themselves and to confess their sins, then God can go forward. Probably the pouring out of water in connection with fasting was a sign of self-abnegation as though they would pour out themselves, yield themselves up to the Lord. David says prophetically of Christ: "I am poured out like water" (Ps. 22: 14). Twice Paul speaks of himself as being "poured out as a drink-offering" (Phil. 2: 17; II. Tim. 4: 6, R. V., margin). Something was done, things were getting righted, and Samuel was established as judge.

Whenever the work of the Lord is going forward then the enemy comes in to withstand and to oppose. The Philistines heard of the great religious convention of the children of Israel at Mizpah, and they began to feel it was time for them to be moving. As long as God's people were serving strange gods and Ashtaroth, the Philistines let them alone. But if they were renouncing to serve the Lord only, it was going to be a hard time for their enemies, so "the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A PERIOD of forty years elapsed between the events of last week's lesson and those to be considered now. They were years of sadness and misery for Israel. Under the rule of Eli's sons there was growing alienation from God and increased subservience to the people of the land. At the end of twenty years from the time when Samuel received the message of warning, Israel made a desperate effort to rid itself of the Philistine yoke. They were routed in the first battle with a loss of four thousand men. Then, as was always the case with them in any great calamity, their thoughts turned to the God whom they had deserted. He was to them still only the God who had delivered them in the past, who had fought for them against their enemies, and who could deliver them in the present; not the God whose law they must obey. Human nature has not changed much in subsequent ages. There are still multitudes of people who think of God in the same way, calling upon him in trouble, and appealing to him in some emergency, and forgetting him in prosperity. It is a significant sign of their spiritual declension, that they should have imagined that all it was necessary to do to enlist God on their side was to carry the ark into their camp. Evidently they had come to regard the sacred chest much as their enemies regarded their idols. It was to them a talisman, a charm, a thing so associated with God as to be his very presence. The device failed, as might have been expected. They showed that they knew little of him when they could think there was any other way of obtaining his help than that of repentance and humiliation. The lesson has to be learned by every generation. The error is constantly reappearing in one form or other. Baptism, partaking of the Lord's Supper, large gifts, penances, are easy compared with heart-cleansing and sincere sorrow for sin, but God will not except them as substitutes. Even the presence of the ark did not avail. Again the Israelites were defeated and the ark was captured. The news broke Eli's heart. He swooned when he heard the news and falling was taken up dead. As both his sons had fallen in the battle, Samuel's succession was undisputed. We may believe that his work was that of teaching rather than offering sacrifices. It would probably be done gradually and slowly in his travels from place to place. It was twenty years before Israel was so meated with the truth as to be ready fo public renewal of vows to the Lord. W Samuel judged the time ripe, he calle national assembly, and public confess and intercession was made to God on half of the people. The enemy precipit the conflict that was impending, but time God interfered, the Philistines w ignominiously defeated and were compe to restore the cities they had captured.

We have sinned. Nothing they could h said was so hopeful a sign of amendm as this confession. It is when a man people boasts of perfection and sees harm in their conduct, that the case is perate. A good Quaker who visited a neighbor tried to turn his thoughts to ligion, but the man could not see the r of it. The Quaker showed him many thi in which he had been remiss and pra with him. After a time the sick man came less boastful and made excuses himself. His mind was growing ten and at last he said to his friend, "I find I a great sinner; I fear there is no hope me." The Quaker grasped his h "Thank God," he said, "thou hast fo it out. I have hope of thee now. Le pray once more and see if there be mercy for thee." The man found p before he died.

The Lord heard him. An incident in life of John Rutledge shows how hears prayer. He was mate of a ve which sailed from Buffalo while the was still full of dangerous ice. When t thirds of the voyage had been accomplis the captain saw to his dismay that th was closing in on them. Soon, but a narrow furrow of water remained wit huge ice-field on each side. As far as eye could see this ever-narrowing cha stretched as their only way to saf Could they get through before the cha closed? If not, the vessel would be crus like a nut between crackers. In the c the wind fell, and hope was abandone all on board except Rutledge. He as the captain's permission to go below pray. The captain, though not a relig man, consented, and said he might with him any others who wished to The captain himself joined them, and ledge prayed fervently for delivera When they returned to the deck, the words that greeted their ears were from man at the wheel. "We're saved, cap he said; "it's blowing Nor-Nor-Ea One of the men asked if more can should be spread. "No," said the C tain, "don't touch her. Some one el managing this ship."

The Lord thundered. A faithful, reve man sees God in all the affairs of life. was probably an ordinary thunder-st but it was sent of God to do his wor discomfiting the enemies of his people. the forces of nature are at his comm and that is not a sagacious man who not look beyond the natural force to God directing it. HOW THE ARMENIANS SUFFER.

v. Cyrus Hamlin, Founder of Roberts College, Constantinople, Eloquently Pictures their Woes—America Must Save them, he says, from Dying of Starvation and Cold—Heroic Women Martyrs who Died Calling on Jesus.

VERYTHING indicates the approach of a great crisis in the affairs of Armenia. The life-and-death struggle of a brave Christian people and their Moslem oppressors seems about to culminate, and t question that now agitates the civilized rld is: all the menians totally ced by Turkey, by means of massacre, l and starvation, or shall they be rescue by the intervention of the European ions and the power of their ancient opssor permanently curbed? Meanwhile a until the Powers decide how to proceed, t question may resolve itself by the extinination of a large part of the Armenian ion by famine and cold, unless the hume portion of mankind, looking above a bevond mere treaties and diplomatic notiations, sends them the relief they so silv and urgently need.

HE CHRISTIAN HERALD has in previ issues, laid before its readers, the story o he terrible sufferings of the Armenians it Kurdistan, and especially in the provinces vere the massacres took place last year. Today we present an interview with a gentman whose high position, great learning a wide experience entitle it to the most sious consideration. Coming from the li of one who speaks with authority and kows whereof he speaks, it is doubtless t most eloquent and convincing plea that h yet been made on this subject, which nv occupies the attention of two hemiseres.

robably the best known and most explenced of all the Americans who have sved in the missionary field in Asia Mino's Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, D.D. the venerable fnder of Roberts College, Constantino-p Dr. Hamlin, who is now in the United Stes, has a life-long acquaintance with t Armenian question in its various phases a is a strong champion of the right of ts oldest Christian nation on earth to be mitted to live and worship in the faith o their fathers. Conversing on the subj at an interview in THE CHRISTIAN HRALD office, Dr. Hamlin said:

"The condition of affairs in that country h not been exaggerated in the printed re-pts. I have lately finished reading the S. of some two hundred letters from rsionaries, a very large part of them deali with the oppressions and sufferings of t Armenians, which were of a most fightful character. The poor creatures must e help before the winter opens in earne or they will perish. An Armenian wint is usually very severe, the snow lying o the ground from four to six feet in depth a the cold being intense.

"The whole civilized Christian world st help these people—they must be savefrom death and assisted over the winter. ey can look in no other direction for lp, for there is no sympathy and assistance to be had from Turkey. Indeed, the policy of the Sultan's government is apparently dictated by a desire to efface the Armenian people altogether—at least those of them who will not accept Mohammed. When you talk sympathizingly about these people, a Turk will say in surprise: 'Why do you speak in behalf of such worthless trash and try to save them? They can save themselves—all they need do is to accept Islam and then they are safe and out of trouble.'

"And so," continued Dr. Hamlin, "A Turk regards it as strange that an Armenian should refuse to purchase his life at the cost of his faith; but there are some among them who take a different view. Some of the Turkish soldiers who shared in the terrible atrocities lately perpetrated on the Armenian Christians have been stricken by remorse afterward. One soldier, who had borne his part in several horrible butcheries of women and children, was so troubled that he could not sleep. He had visions of his victims that ultimately drove him insane.

"Mrs. Knapp, a missionary, at Bitlis, related a remarkable incident. A soldier who had helped in the ruthless massacres of the helpless ones, was terribly tormented by conscience. To his wife he said:

"'There was one thing about these women and their children that I do not understand, and I want you to ask the wives of the "giaour" (Christians), about it. It was very strange. The women were offered their life if they would only say: "There is but one God and Mohammed is his prophet," but they would not. They all died in terrible tortures, calling on "Hissos Nazareetsees." That is what I do not understand. Now, I wonder who this Hissos Nazareetsees is, whose very name made these women so brave that with their little children they could die. That is what troubles me greatly.'"

A GROUP OF CHRISTIAN ARMENIAN REFUGEES.

"The wife of this soldier came to the missionary and told the story. 'Now,' she said in conclusion, 'you may be able to tell, so that I can satisfy my husband, for he can do nothing but speak of it. Who is Hissos Nazareetsees?'

"The good missionary sat down by the Moslem wife and told her that the name was that of 'the Worshipful Jesus' of Nazareth, Saviour of the world, whom the Christians serve."

Regarding the prospect of reforms being instituted by Turkey in behalf of the Armenians, Dr. Hamlin spoke doubtfully. The policy of Abdul Medjid toward his Christian subjects, he said, was liberal and humane, but that of the present Sultan is the reverse. Promises of reform, made to the Powers, will be evaded, if possible. "Ah," say the Moslem officials contemptuously, "you 'giaours' may interfere, but we will conduct our affairs in our own way, notwithstanding. These people have got to die!"

In his course toward the Armenians, as Dr. Hamlin explained, the present Sultan violates the Koran, for it contains express directions for the securing of the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness of all subjects alike, Christian as well as Moslem.

Dr. Hamlin spoke in the highest terms of Miss Kimball and her relief work, in conjunction with the other missionaries at Van. No one knew the needs of the suffering people better, or was better qualified to deal with the present very trying situation. It is the duty of the Christians of America to help them as far as we can help them. The Turks will embarrass the work if they can; they wish these people to die. In the whole region of Sassoun—comprised of about 100 villages—forty or fifty villages have been annihilated. A letter from Mr. Cole, a missionary who is employed in relief work, states that he visited a village of 175 houses, every one of which had been destroyed. The Turks would not even permit him to erect a shanty as a defence against the weather, lest some Armenian should get the use of it. They wished these people to die out of cold or starvation.

England, whose official support of Turkey has made it in large measure responsible for the wrongs and sufferings of the Armenians, is now moving for reform in that unfortunate country. At the same time, the English people are helping the Armenians by contributions. On the occasion of opening a bazar held at Chester, for the benefit of the Armenian sufferers, Mrs. Gladstone gave expression to the popular sentiment prevailing in England regarding Armenia's condition in these terms: "No words of mine are needed to describe the frightful need of help. You are all aware of the terrible details. I plead today in behalf of the poor sufferers—that we may be instrumental in allaying their sufferings. As my husband says, we cannot dictate to the government as to the time, but we pray that the Powers may soon take action to end Armenia's woes."

Cable dispatches show that notwithstanding the attitude of the Powers, Turkey is not yet disposed to cease its persecution of the Armenians. Christians have been killed by Kurds and Turks at Trebizond, Rodosto and Ismid. These renewals of violence and slaughter, occurring so soon after the Constantinople riots, will doubtless have the effect of aggravating the perils endured by the Armenians of Van, Sassoun, Bitlis and Moosh, to whose relief, Mr. W. W. Howard, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner is now speeding. Meanwhile the Relief Fund is steadily growing, and there is a prospect that it will accomplish much good, and afford at least food and shelter to a large number of the afflicted Armenian families. A remittance from the Fund has been sent to Miss Kimball at Van to aid her in continuing the work until Mr. Howard arrives. Every contribution to the Fund will be acknowledged in these columns. All contributions should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

TREBIZOND—WHERE ARMENIANS WERE MURDERED.

Among the letters received are many of touching interest:

Mrs. S. H. Bratton, Lewistown, Me., ($1):
My prayer is that the Lord may put it into the hearts of many to respond quickly to this call.

Reader, Plainsboro, N. J., (10) writes:
As God has mercifully just raised me from a sick bed, I feel that I ought to do what I can to help others. Please find enclosed $10 to be used for the purpose of helping these poor Armenians.

"Gratitude," Brooklyn, sends $100 as "a thank offering to the Lord for his mercy in averting a terrible trial." It has been applied to the Armenian Relief Fund, where it will doubtless accomplish much good.

Mrs. H. B. Vaughan, ($4) and Mrs. Mattie Harger, ($1) Wray, Colo., write:
I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the awful sufferings of the Armenians and of the relief movement. It will be a pleasure to help save one from starvation. Hoping this will fall into the direct channel we dispatch a small mite ($5), hoping and praying that the blessed Lord will use it to the saving of somebody from starvation.

A Friend in Detroit, Mich., writes:
I enclose five dollars for your Armenian Relief Fund, in the hope that it may encourage others to do what they can in the Name of the Master.

J. P. R., Ashtabula, O., writes:
I am this day eighty-eight years old, and I wish to make this small contribution ($2), to your Armenian Fund. May God touch every Christian heart and help speedily come to that down-trodden, suffering people.

Rev. S. P. Heath, Penacook, N. H., ($3) writes:
The case is an urgent one and should enlist an immediate response, not only from all Christians in the United States, but from every one possessing a single spark of humanity. All Christian nations should unite in demanding the Porte to punish the robber Kurds and to protect and redress the suffering Armenians.

The Episcopal Church Conference in Chicago has decided to ask the General Convention to take steps toward helping the Armenian Relief movement.

"Della Vennell," Roxbury, Mass., sends an express order for $145, a gift that will doubtless do efficient service in the cause of Christ and humanity. Miss M. E. W., Lincoln City, Neb., sends a "souvenir of travel," a beautifully chased gold pendant, which she wishes to be disposed of for the Relief Fund.

BLESSED BEYOND HIS PRAYER.

More than thirty years ago, a young Methodist missionary prayed, as he stood for India, that he might bring one hundred souls to Christ. After such a glorious, and as he regarded it, remarkable harvest, he would be content to go to his reward. Instead of one hundred converts in the city station to which he was assigned, there are now more than five thousand; and the work is more prosperous than ever, though the young man has been promoted to another more responsible position. His name is Rev. Dr. T. J. Scott, President of the Bareilly Theological Seminary in India.

KEEPING THEIR PROMISE.

Years ago, Rev. Dr. Clark, a Baptist missionary, received an invitation from some hill people of Assam to become their teacher, They promised to care for him and treat him well if he would make his home among them Accepting their offer he found them kind, but unable to understand the wants of civilized men. Little better than savages themselves, they supposed he could live as they did. After finding them kind and teachable, the missionary determined to send for his wife, and told the people that, as they had promised him a large, comfortable house, he would be glad to have it, since he intended to send for his wife. The reply was,

"Certainly. We will build it this afternoon."

Immediately a company of men, with tools for work, went to the forest, cut down bamboo and other wood, and leaves for thatching; then, returning with their loads, began to build. The whole community worked with earnest zeal, and before night a house large enough for several rooms was ready, and by dark the young missionary was at home in it. Later the half-savages went to meet the missionary lady, and carried her and her goods on their backs to the distant home built for her.

To-day, by the grace of God, as the result of that mission couple, those wild people of the hills have a written language and the Gospel in it, while they themselves are worshipers of the true God.

THE FIRESIDE AS A SCHOOL.

It may not have occurred to many that the fireside is really an educational institution—a seminary of infinite importance. There are many parents who would be glad to give their children the benefit of college training, but find it impossible, owing to straitened circumstances yet every child who has a home is a graduate of the hearth. So woven in with the roof of childhood is the education the fireside bestows, that it gives color to the whole texture of life. It is no uncommon thing to see an aged man holding fresh in his recollection the events of his childhood. All the wide space between that and the present [illegible] is a forgotten waste; but the impressions of his childhood were so deep they have become lasting. At your seminary of learning — the family fireside — are you making your instructors' task an easy one?

MISSIONARIES AND THEIR CHILDREN.

"How many children of parents here are missionaries, or engaged in Gospel work at home?" asked one in a missionary meeting in Madura, India, some years ago. The question aroused curiosity; and a careful canvass was made, with most astonishing results. One hundred children were represented by the parents of that conference; and, of those hundred, ninety-four were either missionaries in India or [illegible] countries, or engaged in evangelistic work in the native lands of their parents The six remaining were too young for any work of any kind, but would, in all probability, follow the examples of parents and older brothers and sisters. While this is certainly a most remarkable fulfilment of promise, it is not peculiarly exceptional. A very large proportion, it may be as many as four-fifths, of the children of missionaries become themselves missionary Gospel workers. It is quite common for every son and daughter of a missionary to follow the footsteps of the parent. Dr. John Scudder's nine children became missionaries; four or five of Doctor J. V. Talmage's children became Gospel workers. All of Dr. H. H. Jessup's six daughters are either on or soon to return to their father's field. These instances might be multiplied. The promise is fulfilled when parents keep their part of the covenant.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

PRINCE AND PRINCESS BETROTHED.

SEVERAL royal houses in Europe are interested in the betrothal of the young couple whose portraits appear on this page. They are the Prince Ernest of Hohenlohe-Langenburg and the Princess Alexandra of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. It is interesting to trace the curious relationships that are involved by the intermarriages of the royal personages from whom they are descended—relationships which mean so much in the society of European courts. The prince traces his descent to the Duchess of Kent, who was the mother of Queen Victoria. At the time of her marriage to the Duke of Kent, who was the fourth son of King George III, she was the widow of the Prince of Leiningen and had two children, a son and a daughter, who were thus half-brother and sister to the Queen. The daughter married and had four children, one of whom is father of the young Prince Ernest. He is also related to the Imperial house of Germany, the Empress being his first cousin. The princess is related on her father's side to the English court, and on her mother's side to the Russian. Her father is Prince Alfred, the second son of the Queen, and her mother is the Princess Marie, daughter of Alexander II, Emperor of Russia, and aunt of the present Emperor. The betrothal of these two highly connected young people is said to have given general satisfaction among the imperial and royal personages related to them, and messages of congratulation and good wishes, bearing the crests of the most illustrious houses in Europe, have poured in upon them. Whatever blessings these good wishes may refer to, we may be sure that high connections are not among them, as the young prince and princess are popularly supposed to be unusually well endowed with them. Their truest happiness depends solely on that one element of relationship. No worldly rank or station can do so much to secure it as for them to become children of the King of kings, and that privilege is open to all.

"As many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God. John 1 : 12.

A Suit for a Head.

In a volume of records of extraordinary lawsuits, a law student has found one that he believes to be unique. It was the suit of a surgeon for the possession of the head of a deceased patient. During the man's lifetime the surgeon had attended him, and noting the very peculiar shape of his head, had in a joking way expressed the wish that he could have such a head in his collection of skulls. The patient afterwards became very poor, and being in need of medical help, called in his old friend, the surgeon. He frankly told him that he could not pay his fee, but reminded him of his former debts, and said that if the doctor would attend him free and pay his funeral expenses when he died, he would sign an undertaking authorizing him to take possession of the head. The surgeon agreed, and for some years attended the man without charge whenever he was called in. When he died, the surgeon put in his claim; but the man's friends repudiated it. They were willing and willing to pay the funeral expenses, and they objected to the body being mutilated. The surgeon then brought suit, but unsuccessfully. The court held that there could be no property in the ordinary sense of the term in a dead body and therefore the deceased never had any right to it that he could legally convey. The surgeon was averse to litigation and would not appeal the case, though he was assured that the decision would not be sustained in a higher court. He consequently lost the ghastly prize he hoped to have secured as payment for his services. His grievance, however, was against his patient's friends rather than against the patient himself, who was probably acting in good faith under the belief that he had the right to arrange for the disposal of his body after death. It may be hoped that he arranged for the disposal of his soul, which was a much more important matter. If he gave it to Christ, he might be quite sure that that arrangement would not fail. Like the Apostle, he could say:

I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. (II. Tim. 1 : 12.)

An Equine Experiment.

A disturbance involving several persons in trouble occurred in New York, on October 7. It arose from a lady's experiment with a favorite horse. She was seated in a buggy and people on the street were amused to hear her talking to the horse in the shafts as they went by. Presently the horse became frightened and ran away. It was then seen that the lady was driving without reins. She did not appear to be much alarmed, but continued to speak to the horse bitterly upbraiding him with his misconduct as if he were perfectly conversant with the English language. She also gave him an occasional cut with her whip to emphasize her remarks. After running three blocks, the horse quieted down and came to a standstill at a word of command from his driver. But before he was brought under control, he had knocked a young man down and hurt him slightly. Full of indignation, the injured man ran after the vehicle, and when he overtook it, abused the driver and insisted on giving her into the custody of the police. Thereupon some of her friends who happened to be near, interfered, and there was a fight in which several persons took part. The disturbance at length became so extensive that the police reserves were ordered out and had to use their clubs in quelling it. The lady probably regrets now that she tried the experiment of dispensing with reins in driving through a city street. She appears to have been correct in her belief that she would not need reins on account of her horse being restive, but she overlooked the fact that she might need them on account of his being timid. A similar oversight frequently leads to perplexity in trying to solve the mystery of God's providential dealings. The trials and checks which are often seen in the lives of Christians are not always to be regarded as punishments, but are often applied to restrain them from panic. Even God's docile children are liable to be alarmed when untoward events occur, and need to be reminded that God is guiding them.

It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. Jer. 10: 23.)

Misleading Postal Cards.

A journal devoted to the interests of paper manufacturers describes some interesting experiments with the paper of which postal cards are made. Among them is one by which two messages may be written on a card, one of which will be visible and the other invisible, and these may be reversed, the visible one disappearing and the invisible becoming plain. The true message, the journal says, may be written with a quill pen dipped, not in ink, but in a mixture of sulphuric acid and water. When dry, the card bears no trace of the writing. But as a blank postal card might excite suspicion, it may bear a message written with tincture of iodine. When heat is applied to the card, the writing in iodine will disappear, and the writing in diluted sulphuric acid will become visible and legible. There is reason to fear that a similar process is going on with some people's lives. In all the descriptions of the last judgment in the Bible, there is an intimation that the day will be one of surprises. The epitaphs on the tombstones and the reputations current in the world will disappear in the light of the great white throne, and in their place will stand the true, hidden record of the actual life.

For God shall bring every work into judgment and every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil. Eccles. 12 : 14.

A Disastrous Delay.

A man is lying in a New York hospital in a critical condition who has reason to deplore the postponement of a good resolution. He was released from prison only a few months ago, after serving a term of two years for a violent assault which he committed while under the influence of liquor. His wife pleaded with him to abandon drink but was unsuccessful. He began drinking again and as he was a man of violent temper there seemed a strong probability of his getting into more trouble. His daughter, a girl thirteen years old, of whom he is very fond, added her persuasions to those of her mother and at last he consented to sign the pledge. The girl rejoicing in her triumph, immediately started with him to the house of the priest whose church she attended. But the priest unfortunately was engaged and told them to come another day. While returning home they met some of the man's companions, who, learning that he intended signing the pledge, and had actually made an attempt to do so, insisted on his having one good drink to end with. In spite of his daughter's protest he consented, and all went into the nearest saloon, leaving the girl outside. About half an hour later they emerged in a very quarrelsome state of mind. In a few minutes a fierce struggle ensued. The child, who watched them from the other side the street, saw her father fall. The other men ran away, leaving him there bleeding copiously from a gash in his throat. He was taken to the hospital and carefully treated, but there is little chance of his recovery. If the man had gone to another temperance worker to sign the pledge, when the first was too busy to attend to him, he might not have fallen into this dreadful trouble. It is always dangerous to delay putting a good resolution into effect. None are so likely to miss the path of safety in morals or religion as they who allow little difficulties to turn them from their purpose. Many who mean to seek the Lord die without salvation through postponing the search, as did he who said to the Apostle:

When I have a convenient season I will send for thee Acts, 24 : 25).

Traced by His Footprints.

A burglar who was sentenced on October 12 to fourteen years imprisonment, was detected through the artistic skill of the man whom he had robbed. A few weeks ago he went to New Rochelle, N. Y., and broke into the house of an artist who lives there. He succeeded in carrying off a quantity of silver and other valuables. The only clue there was to the thief was his footprint clearly marked in the dust on the floor of the piazza. He had taken off his shoes so as to make no noise and, as he wore no stockings, the marks on the soles of his feet were as clearly marked on the dust as a seal impresses itself on the wax. The artist made a careful drawing of the footprint, and when the police arrested a suspected man a few days later, the sole of his foot was compared with the artist's drawing. It was found to correspond exactly. The lines on the foot were somewhat remarkable so that the evidence against him seemed conclusive. The thief appeared to arrive at the same conclusion, for he decided to make no defence at his trial, but to make a frank confession. He was accordingly sentenced to serve a fourteen-year term in the prison at Sing Sing. It was singular that the very means the burglar adopted to escape being detected should have furnished the most conclusive evidence against him. Probably he was not aware of the fact declared by physiologists that in all the almost infinite varieties of feet and hands, there are few, if any, precisely alike. Many people who are not burglars think that they are safe in committing sin if they are quiet and secret about it, but they forget, as this man did, the warning of the ancient patriarch:

Thou settest a print on the heels of my feet. Job 13 : 27.

BRIEF NOTES.

All Letters to Dr. Talmage as Editor of The Christian Herald should be addressed to him at The Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

Every Season marks a New Stage in progress and development in connection with the publication of The Christian Herald. Our readers will be interested to know that we have just completed the work of setting up [illegible] and that after Nov. 1st, the first page of this journal will appear printed in many [illegible] Scenes in every land and events of interest at home and abroad will be daily illustrated [illegible] in every issue thereafter. This new departure in art will render The Christian Herald more attractive and valuable than ever to its constantly increasing army of readers in all parts of the globe.

The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Japan, Mr. T. Myoshi, is a communicant in a Congregational church.

The Coronation Robe for the Empress of Russia which is being made in Paris, in readiness for the ceremony of crowning her and her husband as Empress and Emperor, is to cost $200,000.

The Poor of Russia are Mourning the Death of Chancellor Jermakoff, who, within twenty years, has given $5,000,000 to charitable purposes. Thousands of the poor of Moscow attended his funeral.

Ex-President Harrison, in the Course of a speech at the Indiana Methodist Episcopal Conference, recently expressed his joy "that the churches are learning that devotion to local political interests "is not only consistent with the supreme love for the nation that crowns and secures all, but that the two are inseparable."

The Gifts to Foreign Missions at the Concluding session of the Convention of the International Christian Alliance in New York on Oct. 13 aggregated $52,000 of which $40,000 was pledged by the givers in money. Besides this a person present, whose name was not disclosed gave a deed of property valued at $30,000.

Dr. Joseph Parker, Writing to an English journal, says that he is not so anxious as some are, and as he himself used to be long ago, about going around answering infidels. He was [illegible] awakening Christians. He would like a man, a true revivalist, to arise among us "who will turn sleep into blasphemy, and make men ashamed of their doubtfulness."

We are Requested to Remind Pastors and members of Presbyterian churches among our readers that the late General Assembly passed a resolution. "That we recommend to our churches that the last prayer-meeting in October in each year be set apart for the purpose of emphasizing and exalting the importance of observing the Sabbath day."

The Church Missionary Society Sent Out at the beginning of this month a large party of missionaries to various parts of the world. On Oct. 2 a farewell meeting at which nearly one hundred of these new missionaries were present was held in St. Bride's Church, London. About one half of the party are ladies and many of them are going to China. Several volunteered to go to the post of danger at Kucheng.

Mr. Thomas Hughes, Author of "Tom Brown's School Days," has recently published a letter urging temperance people of all shades of opinion to unite for the purpose of going to Parliament with a moderate, definite and reasonably comprehensive measure for dealing with the drink evil. Mr. Hughes says he is moved to take this step because, as a county judge, he has to commit at least 100 [illegible] present law as to the sale of intoxicants.

A Dispatch from Port Huron, Mich., States that at a funeral which recently took place there, the pall-bearers were not permitted to enter the [illegible] as the Grand Army was not a Roman Catholic organization he could not allow persons belonging to it to enter the church wearing its badge. The dead man was a veteran and nearly everyone at the funeral was a [illegible] to remain outside rather than remove their badges.

EARNESTNESS IN WORK.

A BROTHER comes into a house of prayer, and he stands up to speak a word for Christ. How tremulous he is! He says: "I wonder if the people will hear me?" His heart is not thoroughly enlisted. He wonders who will criticize. After awhile he gets through, and he wonders whether he made any mistakes, and he goes away asking his friend, "How did I do to-night? Did I get along well, or did I make a balk?" He is not in earnest. There is another young man beside him. What does he care for rhetoric? He says: "Here are people that I must meet before the throne of God, and I have but three minutes now to talk to them. I don't care what people say. It is between God and my soul, and their souls." A Sabbath School teacher sits down before her class. She is not in earnest; she has no appreciation of the great work to which she is called. She thinks that it is a fine thing to be a Sabbath School teacher. She comes in and says to the class: "Fine day!" Then she arranges her apparel; then she gives an extra twist to the curl, and looks at the apparel of all the children in the class.

A minister of the Gospel comes on the Sabbath day into the ante-room of the church. He is not in earnest. He has just happened to get into the ministry. He says: "I wonder what the newspapers will say to-day? I wonder how many critics there will be in the church? I wonder if that sharp-looking man that sat before me last Sabbath, looking at me through those spectacles, will be there to-day? I wonder if my hair is parted straight? I wonder how my cravat is tied? I wonder if my shoes have the right polish? I wonder if that gesture I made awhile ago is graceful?" The Sabbath goes by, the people disperse to their homes, no saving impression is made, the Sabbath is dead and will not live again until the resurrection. Another man of God comes to the ante-room of the church. He says: "Now there will be many people here this morning. What shall I say to them? I may be dead before next Sabbath. Some of the people who will be in church to-day will never be there again. It is my last chance at them. Oh, God, help me now; if thou never didst help me before, help me to-day." Oh, how different then the preacher feels. How little he cares for what the world says of him. How his soul goes up to God in an agony of earnestness. How little he cares for the gesture, the style of his apparel, or what the critics may say. It is a matter between himself, and his God, and his hearers.

One of the first lessons in the Christian primer deals with economy of time.

Christ must first be lifted up in our own lives before we can lift him up to others.

STAGNATION VS. SENSATION.

WITH two offensive words we head this article. We do not know which word is the worst. It is the national habit in literature and religion to call that sensationalism which we ourselves cannot do. If an author writes a book that will not sell, he is apt to charge the books of the day which do succeed as being sensational. There are a great many men who, in the world and the Church, are dead failures, who spend their time in letting the public know that they are not sensationalists. The fact is, that they never made any stir while living, nor will they in dying, save as they rob the undertaker of his fees, they not leaving enough to pay their dismission expenses. We hate sensationalism in the pulpit, so far as the word means the preaching of everything but the Gospel; but the simple fact is, that whenever and wherever faith, and repentance, and heaven, and hell are proclaimed with emphasis, there will be a sensation. The people in our great cities are hungry for the old Gospel of Christ. Stagnation is worse than sensationalism. We have always noticed that just in proportion as a man cannot get along himself, he is fearful of some one else making an excitement. Last week, a mud-turtle down by the brook opened its shell, and discoursed to a horse that was coming down to drink. The mud-turtle said to the horse: "Just as I get sound asleep, you are sure to come past and wake me up. We always used to have a good quiet time down here in the swamp till you got in the habit of thumping along this way. I am conservative, and like to keep in my shell. I have been pastor of thirteen other mud-turtles, and we always had peace till you came, and next week at our semi-annual meeting of mud-turtles, we shall either have you voted a nuisance, or will talk it over in private, eight or ten of us, which will probably be the more prudent way." Then the mud-turtle's shell went shut with a snap, at which the horse kicked up his heels as he turned to go up to the barn to be harnessed to a load of corn that was ready for the market. Let us all wake up and go to work. There are in the private membership of our churches, and in the ministry, a great many men who are dead, but have never had the common decency to get buried. With the harvest white and "lodging" for lack of a sickle, instead of lying under the trees criticizing the sweating reapers who are at work, let us throw off our own coats, and go out and see how good a swathe we can cut.

The true Christian puts the large end of the telescope to his eye when looking at his own good deeds.

The low-descending sun casts the longest shadows, and the influence of a faithful Christian's death lasts a whole lifetime.

STARTLING INTELLIGENCE.

A PROMINENT New York daily paper, speaking recently of a trial then progressing in the courts, informed us that the foreman of the jury had just had his hair cut, and that another of the jurymen appeared in a light suit. It seems to us that the paper containing this absorbing intelligence ought to have issued an extra, giving these "facts" earlier to the people. The fact that one of the jurymen had put on a white vest might not have been so startling; but that the foreman of the jury had had his hair cut certainly demanded more attention. We are seized with a great curiosity to know who cut it, and with what kind of a shears, and what has become of the severed locks. We suggest to the judge and counsel on this trial that this thing is not to be lightly passed over. It may be that this juryman has allowed this liberty to be taken by one of the parties in the trial. If he, the aforesaid juryman with his hair cut, allowed these dissevered capillary attachments to go into the possession of the defendant, then it is proof that this juryman has gone over to that side; or, if these silken fragments have become the property of the plaintiff, then the juryman has been taken possession of by that side. We call upon the judge to investigate this matter, and see to it that none of the other jurymen, during the progress of the trial, have their hair cut.

But, to be serious, would it not be well for our daily papers, when they cannot find for their columns information more valuable and important than the items to which we have alluded, to avail themselves of a few essays on some practical subject that might not only amuse but educate.

Christ never lets go of children that are unconditionally given him by their parents.

It is a mistake to think that the dollar of the saloon-keeper has the same purchasing power as the dollar which has been blessed by God.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Miss C. Yofft. 183 Lexington avenue, New York City, writes:

I am a young Christian and am anxious to help bring souls to Christ. I have a sweet soprano voice and I would volunteer my services cheerfully on the Sabbath to any Protestant denomination if you think it will be the means of helping on the Lord's work.

H. B. Thornton, Walter, Ala. Who were the sons of God and the daughters of men referred to in Gen. 6: 4?

Ancient commentators believed that the "sons of God" were angels, but latterly, the scholars who do not accept the theory of evolution, have held that they were descendants of Seth and possibly of Abel, who married children of Cain. Evolutionists hold that they were the higher type of men allying themselves with women of the lower type, who were practically animals.

William Bayo, Glenn's, Va. Did the men who were with Paul when he was stricken down on the way to Damascus hear the voice speaking to him? In Acts 9: 7 they are said to have heard and in Acts 22: 9 they are said not to have heard?

The only reasonable explanation of the apparent contradiction is that in the latter passage Paul meant that they did not understand the words spoken. They heard the voice but not articulate words. In the one case, the account is believed to have been written by Luke, and in the other, it is Paul who is speaking.

Delia Messick, James City, N. C. Why is the heart mentioned so many times in the Bible, if it were not the seat of our affections, conscience, sin, etc? If it is the brain, why should it not be called brain instead of heart?

In the Biblical point of view, human life, in all its operations, is centred in the heart. It is the central organ, in a psychical sense and through it the whole life of the soul, in the lower as well as the higher spiritual spheres, finds expression (Prov. 4: 23). The brain, on the other hand, is the organ of mentality, the seat of volition, the "thinking machine," the regulative channel through which the various functions find intelligent interpretation.

Earnest Reader, Alinda, Can. Is the blessing of holiness entirely separate from that of regeneration?

Holiness, as the word is generally understood, refers to the end of the progressive work of the Holy Spirit on the heart. Regeneration is the new birth, which is a completed act, not a process. When a man believes in Christ, he is justified and the righteousness of Christ is imputed to him. Then commences the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit and he grows in grace becoming more and more like Christ. There is all the difference between them that there is between birth and growth.

Jesse McAdam, Portland, Ore. In the study of Biblical chronology, it is strange how frequently the number forty occurs. Can you furnish any reason for it?

Forty does indeed seem to be a number of frequency and significance. The Flood lasted forty days and forty nights; Moses was forty days and nights on Sinai, Moses lived forty years in Egypt, forty in Midian and forty in the wilderness; the spies spent forty days in searching the land; Saul, David and Solomon each reigned forty years; Gideon judged Israel forty years; the Philistine oppression lasted forty years; forty days of repentance were granted to Nineveh; and the Saviour spent forty days and nights in solitude in the wilderness. There are other instances where the same number has played a prominent part.

T. J. W., Centennial, W. Va. 1. Is it right for a wicked man to pray? I have heard it asserted that the prayers of a wicked man are an abomination to God. 2. Is it possible for a converted person to commit sin? If the soul or spirit only sins of the flesh?

1. It is the duty of the wicked to pray for forgiveness and for converting grace. The phrase you mention has reference to formal, hypocritical prayers of the lips only, not of the heart. An earthly father would not feel kindly toward a son who, while living in habitual disobedience spoke to him as if he was honoring him and was continually asking him for favors. 2. It is possible. There are sins of unbelief of doubt, of rebellion of which the soul is guilty. The Spirit of God in the heart has often to protest and bring him anew to repentance.

Constant Reader, Kylertown, Pa. Who was the wife of Pilate who had a dream concerning Jesus? See Matthew 27: 19.

Her name is given as Claudia Procula by some of the older writers, and it is also asserted that she had been a proselyte to Judaism before the Crucifixion. Nothing certain is known as to her history, but the tradition that she became a Christian is as old as the time of Origen. She has been canonized by the Greek Church.

"Reader," sends this for the benefit of "Inquirer," New Bedford, whose letter was recently answered in THE MAIL-BAG:

I have been just where you are. I was once away from Christ for over forty years, but the Holy Spirit influenced me, and He called me back. I am happy in His love again. Because you are indifferent any longer, and are longing to love again, is a sure sign that the Spirit is leading you, and if you will only give up all striving to make yourself better, and just come to Him pleading His promises, he will forgive you.

O. L., Olmstead Falls, O. 1. How many Christians have been martyred in Cuba during the past year? 2. Is it true that the veritable house which Thomas Payne predicted that Christianity would become extinguished within fifty years is now used as a Bible House?

1. We know of no record of martyrdoms in Cuba during the past year. 2. You probably refer to Voltaire, the infidel, whose former residence in Paris has been used as a depot for Bible House.

M. A. H., Aberdeen, Miss., sends us the following touching tribute to the memory of a Christian ex-slave, lately dead.

William E. Whitfield (colored) was about seventy-five years old. He came from North Carolina in 1830 with his owner, Edmund Whitfield, and lived on his plantation near here ever since. He was loved by his owners, their children and grandchildren. Has been a devoted member of the Presbyterian Church in this place forty-five years, loved its doctrines, attended the sanctuary, read the Bible and hymn-book and talked of Jesus as Saviour and Redeemer. He was industrious, honest and a true Christian. Good-bye, dear old Uncle William! I know you have met "Old Master" in God's House of many mansions.

R. H. S., New York City. Is there any hope of final salvation of those who die impenitent?

We can find no basis in the Bible for such hope. The whole tenor of its teaching is against it. But if there should be a way by which lost souls may find a means of obtaining pardon, we should not expect to find it in the Bible. That is a revelation of the way of salvation in this life and it is not in its province to explain the means of salvation for those who reject its offer, should such means exist. All our knowledge of humanity here, also coincides with the belief in the hopelessness of the condition of the lost. The older a man grows in sin the less probability is there of his repenting it, and we doubt whether after a season in perdition he would be disposed to quit it. He would more probably be confirmed in rebellion.

A. H. McKenzie writes:

Ex. 6: 25; Num. 3: 2-3 ought to be proof that Eleazar was twenty years and over before the numbering referred to in Num. 14: 29. Joshua 23 is proof that he died in Canaan. How can you harmonize this with Num. 14: 29? Read Num. 26. 62 and I think we find the correct answer.

Subscriber, Drew, Ia. Which is the greater benefit to us, to get good or to do good?

We assume that our correspondent uses the words "get good" in the sense of becoming good one's-self. As it is impossible for a corrupt tree to bring forth good fruit, so it is impossible for a man, in his unregenerate state, to serve God purely and acceptably. Such service is the highest good, but in order to perform it, the heart must be cleansed and purged of sin and filled with the Holy Spirit. Hence, the first desideratum is to "get good," and the highest aim of the Christian is to "do good," i.e., to serve God and love our fellowmen.

Children of Ceylon.

Why the Brown-Skinned Lads of the Beautiful Island are Being Trained in the Christian Mission Schools.

REV. T. S. SMITH.

SUCH is the progress of Christianity in Ceylon that the condition of that lovely country can no longer be accurately pictured in the words of Bishop Heber's beautiful hymn:

What though the spicy breezes
Blow soft o'er Ceylon's isle,
Where every prospect pleases
And only man is vile.

Since these lines were written, a great spiritual and social transformation has taken place in Ceylon. Its population has been evangelized; churches, chapels, Sunday schools, mission schools, and seminaries have sprung up everywhere. The self-sacrificing labors of the missionaries have indeed borne fruit, some a hundred and some a thousand-fold.

Miss Margaret W. Leitch, a devoted missionary at Jaffna, and whose work there is already familiar to many readers of this journal, has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a letter which affords a delightful glimpse of the methods of training the youthful Ceylonese to useful Christian service. Writing of two boys of thirteen and seven years respectively, she says:

"They were dressed as boys in Ceylon usually are, that is, four straight yards of white cotton cloth wound around the lower part of the person and reaching from the waist to the ankles, and as many more yards of the same material draped across the shoulders and chest, the whole forming a simple, cool, sufficient clothing. Like other boys of their age they wore no head dress or foot covering. According to the custom of the country their heads were shaven, excepting a small portion of the crown where the hair was allowed to grow long and was done up in a small knot without the aid of hair pins. Their complexion was that of a good strong cup of coffee with plenty of rich cream stirred in. They had lithe, well-shaped limbs, and a general air of alertness.

"They had been pupils for some years in the mission school in their village, Usan. They had not only committed to memory the prescribed Bible verses, Golden Texts and hymns, and learned to tell in their own language the stories of the four Gospels, but their teacher and his warm-hearted wife (who is a Eurasian woman,) had often spoken and prayed with them, urging them to give their hearts to Christ and become his followers. They had given themselves to Christ and were trying to follow him.

"They told us that their elder brother and they had refused to worship idols or to perform any of the heathen ceremonies, and that they had for some months been regularly praying and reading the Bible daily and keeping the Sabbath holy, and attending the Sabbath School and the preaching services. They were also accustomed now and then, when their garden and fields had all been watered and the work of the day was done, to go to the house of the teacher and, together with some other Christian people who had also become interested in Christianity, to spend a little time in Bible study and prayer and the singing of Christian hymns.

"On one occasion, when a great festival was being held to the god Kantha-swamy, the two lads refused to join in the ceremonies or attend the celebration at all. This gave great offence to the priests, and the temple manager declared that unless the lads came and worshipped the idol, the family would not be permitted to draw water any longer from their garden or home from the temple well. This was a very serious matter; but the young converts persisted and the manager threatened to call a meeting of the high-caste people and to "out-caste" the whole family, if the children did not come. But the threat was afterward carried out, and the family thereafter was cut off from all social intercourse with their neighbors. Persecution followed a long period of persecution. Rejected, disowned and thrust out-of-doors by their own family, the lads found shelter at the house of a catechist, who brought them to the missionary residence next morning. They were shortly afterward entered as pupils at the Tillipally Normal, Training and Industrial School. The father relented so far as to consent to this arrangement, and said to Miss Leitch: "I give these boys to you. They are henceforth your sons and you are henceforth their mother. Do with them as you will."

Since that time, the kind missionaries have cared for the outcaste lads and borne the expense of their education. After they had been in the school six months, they were formally received into the Christian Church on confession of faith, their eldest brother being received at the same time. Friends in other lands have lovingly shared the burden of training these boys. Their conversion has had a wonderful influence, for already their sister has become a regular attendant at the mission school, and Gospel meetings have several times been held in the home of their parents, who are preparing to abandon all the old idols and superstitions and follow Christ.

Some of the work performed at the Tillipally Training School is shown in the photographic illustrations on this page. In this institution the pupils are not only prepared for the Government Teacher's Certificate Examination, and fitted to become teachers in village schools, but they are carefully taught carpentry, masonry, type-setting, book-binding, or photography. This industrial training is found to have a most beneficial effect upon the character of the pupils, teaching humility, obedience, and painstaking activity, and it also makes them more useful members of the community. This school has been a Christian home and a city of refuge to many in years past, and from among the former pupils four are now ordained native pastors, several are catechists, many are teachers in mission village schools, and others are employed in government service, or as conductors on tea and coffee estates, or farmers and mechanics in their own villages. Native public opinion, too, is changing regarding the school. The parents of these boys occasionally visit them and seem pleased at their progress and with their surroundings.

The Normal Training School at Tillipally, which is under the charge of Rev. T. S. Smith, is doing an excellent work among the native youth of Ceylon. Permanent scholarships are endowed at $250 and students are supported at the rate of $10 a year. The influence of such an institution is every year gaining in appreciation among those who are working for the redemption of the beautiful island of Ceylon.

A Boy's Chances.

There are many who will agree that boys who have to work for a living should be encouraged, rather than commiserated. Their chances of achieving real success are at least equal to if not greater than those of boys who start life with riches. R. J. Burdette says truthfully that the working lad, being full of grit, reaches out and takes all the chances without waiting to have one given him. But for the poor man the world would have cast anchor six thousand years ago, and be covered with moss and lichens to-day, like a United States man-of-war. George Peabody was a boy in a small grocery; Benjamin Franklin, the printer, the son of a tallow chandler; John Adams, the son of a poor farmer; Gifford, the first editor of the "Quarterly Review," a common sailor; John Milton, the son of a scrivener; Andrew Jackson, the son of a poor Irishman; Andrew Johnson, a tailor; Garfield, a boy of all work, too poor to even have a trade; Grant, a tanner; and Lincoln, a keelboatman and a common farmhand. If there's a patch on your knee, and your elbows are glossy, there is some hope for you, but never say that the poor boy has no chance. He monopolizes all the chances there are.

The Child's Idea of God.

If you tell a child that God loves good children, and that he does not love bad children, the child will believe you, writes H. Clay Trumbull; and then, when he thinks he is a good child, he will be glad that there is a God who can appreciate him; but when he knows he is a bad child, he will perhaps be sorry that there is a God in the universe to be his enemy. So far as your training does its legitimate work, in this instance, the child is trained, not to have faith in God, but to have confidence in his own merits as a means of commending him to the God whom you have resented to him. If, on the other hand, you tell a child that God is love, and that his love goes out unfailingly toward all, even toward those who have no love for him, and that, while God loves to have children good, he loves them tenderly while they are very bad, the child will take in that great truth gratefully; and then he is readier to have faith in God, and to want to be good because the loving God loves to have him good. And in this way a child's faith in God may be the means of quickening and shaping his desires in the direction of well-doing in all that pertains to the little world of child-life.

Card-playing at Home.

Can any father or mother pray the Lord's Prayer as Jesus taught it, and teach their children to play cards in the home? writes Elijah P. Brown. What would be thought of the mental state of the mother who would put a razor in her baby's hand, and pray that it might not cut itself? Isn't knowing how to play cards dangerous knowledge, and is it any safer to eat fruit from that tree than it was for Eve to eat from the forbidden tree in Eden? Is it not true that thousands of professional gamblers learned their first lessons in their mother's parlors? But if only one had started for the pit by that route, would not that be sufficient to prove it a way of danger into which no parent had a God-given right to lead a child? A father at Niagara unintentionally threw his little daughter into the abyss, but it killed her just the same as though he had done it purposely.

AN OLD-FASHIONED SUNDAY.

ALTHOUGH the "old-fasioned Sunday" of our forefathers has been greatly changed, there are still a few rural localities where established customs have not been materially disturbed by "modern progress." To such as these, this charming picture of a village Sunday by Nathaniel Hawthorne may even yet be applied. It is one of the most beautiful things he ever wrote, in all his long literary career:

I am there even before my friend the sexton. At length he comes—a man of kindly but somber aspect, in dark gray clothes, and hair of the same mixture. He comes and applies his key to the wide portal. Now my thoughts may go in among the dusty pews or ascend the pulpit without sacrilege, but soon come forth again to enjoy the music of the bell. How glad, yet solemn too! All the steeples in town are talking together aloft in the sunny air and rejoicing among themselves while their spires point heavenward. Meantime, here are the children, assembling to the Sabbath School, which is kept somewhere within the church. Often, while looking at the arched portal, I have been gladdened by the sight of a score of these little girls and boys in pink, blue, yellow and crimson frocks bursting suddenly forth into the sunshine like a swarm of gay butterflies that had been shut up in the solemn gloom. Or I might compare them to cherubs haunting that holy place.

About a quarter of an hour before the second ringing of the bell individuals of the congregation begin to appear. The earliest is invariably an old woman in black whose bent frame and rounded shoulders are evidently laden with some heavy affliction which she is eager to rest upon the altar. Would that the Sabbath came twice as often, for the sake of that sorrowful old soul! There is an elderly man, also, who arrives in good season and leans against the corner of the tower, just within the line of its shadow, looking downward with a darksome brow. I sometimes fancy that the old woman is the happier of the two. After these, other worshipers drops into church singly and by twos and threes, either disappearing through the doorway or taking their stand in its vicinity. At last, and always with an unexpected sensation, the bell turns in the steeple overhead and throws out an irregular clangor, jarring the tower to its foundation. As if there were magic in the sound the sidewalks of the street, both up and down along, are immediately thronged with two long lines of people, all converging hitherward and streaming into the church. Perhaps the far-off roar of a coach draws nearer—a deeper thunder by its contrast with the surrounding stillness—until it sets down the wealthy worshippers at the portal among their humbler brethren. Beyond that entrance—in theory, at least—there are no distinctions of earthly rank; nor, indeed, by the goodly apparel which is flaunting in the sun would there seem to be such on the hither side.

Here comes the clergyman, slow and solemn, in severe simplicity, needing no black silk gown to denote his office. Now every loiterer has gone in and the street lies asleep in the quiet sun . . But hark! A broken warbling of voices, and now, attuning its grandeur to their sweetness, a stately peal of the organ. Who are the choristers? Let me dream that the angels who came down from heaven this blessed morn to blend themselves with the worship of the truly good are playing and singing their farewell to the earth. On the wings of that rich melody they were borne upward.

The church is a symbol of religion. May its site, which was consecrated on the day when the first tree was felled, be kept holy forever, a spot of solitude and peace amid the trouble and vanity of our week-day world! There is a moral, and a religion too, even in the silent walls. And may the steeple still point heavenward and be decked with the hallowed sunshine of the Sabbath morn!

Sickness Among Children

is prevalent at all seasons of the year, but can be avoided largely when they are properly cared for. Infant Health is the title of a valuable pamphlet accessible to all who will send address to the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., N. Y. City.

PERSONAL AND IMPORTANT.

Several times recently it has happened that the supply of certain particularly desirable premiums was exhausted before all the subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had an opportunity to avail themselves of the premium offers made in connection therewith. To avoid the recurrence of such a much-to-be-regretted condition of affairs, the proprietor of this journal has decided to make a preliminary offer exclusively to our subscribers, and thus afford them an opportunity of providing for themselves, as far as the stock in hand will admit, before submitting his premium propositions to the general public. Hence, the special announcements in our issues of to-day and October 9th.

Our subscribers form one large family, and it is but right and proper that they should have first choice. Hereafter, it shall never be said that outsiders were permitted to make their selections before the wishes of our own members were consulted, and before their requirements were met.

Of course, we cannot even then promise that all selections shall be made good, for of some of the premiums it is impossible to provide more than a very limited supply. For instance, our stock of beautiful Albums of Holy Land Flowers, one of the choicest premiums ever offered, cannot by any possibility be made to go further than one to every fifty of our subscribers. In fact, now that a large number have been taken, not more than one in a hundred can be supplied, and it is safe to say that not one of these precious souvenirs will ever go outside of our family circle. By the time they are ready for delivery—about two or three weeks from the time of this writing—every Floral Album will have been spoken for by the readers of this journal, who very evidently fully appreciate the exceptional treat provided for them by our enterprise and forethought, and who are now hastening to avail themselves of this rare opportunity.

The same will, in a large measure, be the case with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library. "How can you do it?" exclaimed a prominent book-seller when talking over the proposition we contemplated laying before our readers. "I shall probably subscribe for one hundred copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD simply to get hold of that many Libraries," continued he, evidently impressed with the fact that even without the yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, these Libraries are worth more than the money asked for both. But this preliminary offer enables subscribers, who wish to avail themselves of it, to come in ahead of all outsiders, and to appropriate for themselves, if so disposed, the entire lot as far as it may go. We wish we could guarantee to fill every order sent in, but of course that is simply out of the question, unless the late comers will consent to wait until a new supply can be prepared. The stock now provided for will fill the orders for Libraries to the extent of one in every fifteen subscribers, and for the time being orders from our subscribers will have the precedence over all others.

Another matter to which we would particularly draw the attention of our subscribers is the desirability of deciding upon and making provision early in the season for [illegible] themselves. Prompt action, in the first instance, is a guarantee against disappointment, for while at the present time our supply is sufficiently large to meet all demands, day after day it is growing smaller and smaller, and the time will come when we shall have to write, as we had to do last summer to thousands of late comers, [illegible]

Another advantage of acting early in the season is the extra care which we can exer[illegible] before the rush begins. [illegible] worthy of consideration to all our readers, is that timely action is a safe-guard, to a very large extent, against Sunday work on the part of the Express Companies. We do not, nor do our readers, wish to contribute to the necessity of performing manual labor on the Sabbath day; but our contract with the Express Companies calls for such prompt handling of our goods that, they claim, the shipment of extraordinarily large consignments on Friday and Saturday would necessitate work on the Sabbath day. This must be avoided. We cannot consent, and certainly do not care to be a party to, the desecration of the Lord's day, and we feel confident that our readers are in full sympathy with us in this matter. Therefore, instead of crowding everything into the last week or so before Christmas, let all those who feel so disposed, send in their orders early in the season, and if they do not wish to use the premiums until Christmas, it will be a comparatively easy thing for them to put them out of sight until then, especially when the reward is, first the assurance that the premium is theirs; second, that it is on hand, and that therefore there can be no disappointment because of accident or carelessness, and third, that prompt action on their part has avoided the necessity of Sabbath work in handling the goods for shipment.

Our subscribers, no doubt, understand that even if their subscription does not expire until January, or February, or any other time of the year, it matters nothing. When they send the money for the premium offer, we date their subscription one year ahead of any date on which it may now expire, so that prompt action certainly cannot entail any loss on them, while on the other hand it is sure to be to their advantage.

OUR 1896 BIBLES.

A Few Facts Well Worth Knowing.

The premium propositions of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the present fall and winter seasons surpass in every instance anything ever before offered in that way. But without any lack of appreciation due to our Holy Land Floral Album and our wonderful Library, we must confess that we derive the greatest gratification from the remarkable improvements which we have been able to make in our Bible premium propositions. Years ago when Teachers' Bibles in Divinity Circuit binding were beyond the reach of people of ordinary means, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD began to offer a Pearl Type Bible, the best that then could possibly be purchased for any amount of money that would warrant its being offered as a premium. Two years later we were fortunate enough to secure a Ruby Bible, which was one size larger than Pearl. Another year and we were permitted, in addition to the Ruby Type Bible at $2, to offer our excellent Emerald Bible, which was one size larger than Ruby, at $3. This year we have reached the climax. We now are able to offer a Divinity Circuit, Minion Type Teachers' Bible at $2, and the same Bible with leather lining to edge and silk sewed at $3; so that rich and poor get the same type and the difference is only in the binding. Thus, this year we are offering a Bible in clear Minion type one size larger than Emerald, two sizes larger than Ruby, three sizes larger than Pearl, and best of all printed from new type and from plates never before used.

A particularly gratifying feature about this Bible is the comprehensive Word-Book which combines the Concordance, Subject Index, the Gazetteer, the Dictionary, Persons, Places and Things—in fact all information—under one consecutive alphabetical arrangement. It is now no longer necessary to look under half a dozen different headings in hopes of finding a given subject under some one of them. All that is now necessary is to look under the one alphabetical arrangement, and you will find it right there and nowhere else; simplicity itself.

Then there is the Self-Pronouncing feature. Perhaps you are a Sunday School Superintendent or a Sunday School teacher, and have occasion here and there to read aloud from the Word of God, or you read in the family circle a portion of God's Word morning and evening. You come across a proper name, and you stammer, and stutter, and hesitate, and finally either pass the name over as too difficult to pronounce or give it a pronunciation which renders it unrecognizable to the hearers. Now, with our Self-Pronouncing feature, such a thing is impossible. You do not need to be a Greek or a Hebrew scholar in order to be able to correctly—mark you, correctly—pronounce the most difficult Bible name at sight. It is not necessary to study it up at home, and read it over and over again in hopes of remembering it, but just to open your Bible, and the moment you see it the Self-Pronouncing feature enables you to read it correctly. That is in itself worth ten times the price of this Bible to everybody who ever has occasion to read the Bible aloud, whether in public or in the family circle.

But even if you do not have occasion to do that, you do once in a while, here and there, talk about some Biblical character, and you want to feel certain that your pronunciation of the name is the right one. In order to feel certain about that, you must have a Self-Pronouncing Bible, and our Self-Pronouncing Bible is the only one in the market that is absolutely uniform and invariably reliable.

As a practical demonstration of the importance of a Self-Pronouncing Bible, turn over to the 1st of Matthew, or the 3d of Luke, or the 6th chapter of 1st Chronicles, and try to read either of those chapters without stumbling. Not one in a thousand can do it, simply because the names are not the common names in use in our present day, and but very few people have had the advantages of a University education. Heretofore, it was no fault of yours if you could not rattle them off as easily as you can the common English, but hereafter it will be your fault, for we have pointed out the remedy, and it may be yours.

The numbers of the chapters are in plain figures, such as 1, 2, 3, 4, &c., and not, as is most frequently the case, in Roman numerals, as I, II, III, IV, &c. And yet with all this the excellent qualities of our Bible are not exhausted. Did you ever notice how difficult it is to find some of the Minor Prophets in the Bible? Your pastor tells you to turn over to Micah, or to Nahum, or to Amos, or to Hosea, or to Zephaniah, and you stumble all over the leaves, and because of the few pages which it comprises, it is difficult to find that particular book in the Bible. Then you turn to the front of the Bible, and you have to read all the books in their order until you come to the particular one wanted. Not so with our Bible. We have an alphabetical list of the books in front of the Bible, so that in case you look for Zephaniah, you will look under Z, and quickly find it, or for Nahum, you will look under N, for Micah, you would look under M, and for Hosea, you would look under H, and there it tells you on what page of the Bible these books begin. Surely this is an admirable improvement in itself. And so all through the book from beginning to end we present to you new and attractive features—features which are real improvements, and which will make the book truly worth its weight in gold to you.

These Bibles are "International" Bibles than which better Teachers' Bibles are not to be found in this country or in Europe, and as they were prepared and put in type, and electrotyped, and printed in the year of our Lord, 1895, they contain all the latest information obtainable, while the numerous pictures magnificently printed, bring home to the eye matters which it may be difficult to comprehend otherwise than by means of such practical object lessons.

Now, to repeat the offer which was explicitly stated in our issue of October 9th:

For this Minion Type Teachers' Bible, Divinity circuit, American levant binding, gold edges and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, send $2. The Bible alone is worth $3. Remember this, and you will appreciate how much we are doing for our subscribers.

The second offer is of the same [illegible] leather lined to edge, red under gold, and sewed, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for $3. The Bible is worth $5.

Even if your subscription does not expire until later, send now for this premium, and we will date your subscription one year from its present date of expiry. Hence, you lose nothing by acting promptly, but you insure yourself against disappointment.

OUR LIBRARY PREMIUM OFFER.

A Whole Library with Handsome Book-case.

The charming premium illustrated on the opposite page will certainly commend itself to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is now well under way, and we will soon be ready for delivery. We refer to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library, consisting of ten very elegant and exceedingly useful volumes, all contained in a handsome durable book-case, constituting the most Premium ever offered to an intelligent public. The volumes in this Library are as follows:

Around the Tea-Table; Dr. Talmage.
Book of Golden Deeds; Charlotte M. Yonge.
Readings and Recitations for Winter Evenings. An exceptionally fine Compilation.
Golden Treasury for the Children of Bogatzky.
The Children's Portion; Remarkably Interesting, Entertaining, and Edifying.
How to Get on in the World, or the Ladder to Practical Success.
Capital Stories by American Authors Nathaniel Hawthorne and others.
Handbook for American Citizens, or Things Every Patriot Should Know.
A Budget of Christmas Tales; Charles Dickens and others.
Parlor Amusements and Social Etiquette or How to Amuse and How to Behave.

Each of these ten volumes consists of more than 300 pages of bold, clear type, with illustrated title page, printed on excellent paper and beautifully bound in rich silk cloth with an exceptionally artistic gold stamp on side and back. The book-case is lined inside with imported marbleized material and covered on the outside with the same rich silk cloth employed in the binding of the books. The whole Library with book-case is packed in a solid wooden box, which will insure safe delivery in undamaged condition.

These ten elegant books, with a handsome book-case, represent a value of at least $4.50, and are sent together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (making together a value of $6), on receipt of only $3. Each volume complete in itself makes a very superior Christmas gift, so that the subscriber who avails himself of this unequalled offer, becomes the possessor of ten very attractive presents, in addition to a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Many premium offers have from time to time been submitted to the reading public, but never before has one like this been presented.

We have arranged for delivery of enough of these beautiful Libraries to supply about ONE IN EVERY FIFTEEN of our subscribers, and others will be filled in the exact order in which they are received at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Office.

Remember, this offer includes the whole TEN volumes in an unusually attractive book-case, delivered free of all charges, together with a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, all at $3.

Marion's Gift.

I WISH I had something to give."

Marion Wallace was alone, but she spoke aloud, as people who are often by themselves learn to do, the sound of their own voices being company for them.

"I wish I had something to give, but what can I do? I haven't any money, nor any chance of earning it; all my clothes are worn out, at least not good enough to send in a box. There's nothing I can do, nothing, and yet I want to help those poor people who are suffering so much. If Uncle John and Aunt Norah would even let me get a place in a store, or learn a trade, or even let me go into the kitchen and do Bridget's work and pay me Bridget's wages, I'd be more independent, but as it is I'm like a prisoner, and I'm tired of it."

Marion's monologue ceased abruptly. There was a knock at the door, a knock followed immediately by the opening of the same, and a young girl of Marion's age came rushing in, her sweet face aglow with smiles, her hands full of flowers.

"Jessie," said Marion, "I'm so glad to see you. Sit down, dear."

"I'm going over to pack and tie for the Flower Mission," said Jessie Whitney, "and I stopped for you. I haven't time to stay long. But I'll sit here while you comb your hair. I like to be here when your dressing is going on; you have the most magnificent hair I ever saw. There, what glory of color, and what length; you couldn't buy such hair! I've heard that a switch of that length and thickness would cost fifty dollars in town."

A sudden light leaped into Marion's eyes. Under the shelter of her mantle of red gold hair, her cheeks flushed and then paled. She half turned as if to speak, and then resolutely closed her lips and went on brushing the glittering waves of her beautiful hair. Presently, with a swift and dextrous turn of her hand, she wound it into a thick rope, and coiled this round and round upon her head like a crown.

"I will go with you, Jessie, to the Flower Mission rooms," she said. "We'll pick a lot of pansies first. One comfort is Aunt Norah lets me do as I please about picking flowers and giving them away. I never have anything else to give."

Jessie flashed a little comprehending glance at her friend. Has somebody said that friendship is two souls as united as if they abode in one body, two souls between two friends, but just like one soul after all? It was so with Jessie and Marion. They could be together a whole morning each occupied with her work, and her own thoughts, and not conversing except in occasional brief snatches, but neither felt neglected, nor was anything missed. And they played duets together, had signals which they understood and exchanged from their windows, did, in fact, everything that girls do, who are deeply attached to one another and very congenial.

"I never longed in my life," said Jessie, "as I did last night to heap all I had in that missionary's hands, yet when the contribution box was handed, I had nothing to drop in, but a beggarly quarter of a dollar. I couldn't give even myself and my new summer gown, and if I'd wanted to, Papa would have been vexed, for he gave me the money for that specific purpose, to buy clothes, not to educate Telegu children. And I can't go shabby a whole season for the sake of foreign missions."

"I wouldn't care how shabby I went!" said Marion hotly, "but the money for a new outfit seldom comes my way. If you were an orphan, Jessie, and were dressed from the left-overs of your various aunts and cousins, you'd know how helpless I feel, when I'm thrilled and moved, as I am when I hear eloquence like Dr. Fay's, and can do nothing in response."

"Well, dear, never mind," said Jessie, "Let's go on with the flowers. They must be sent to the station before the express train goes down."

Marion said not a word to Jessie, concerning her plan, but she had made one, and her step as she walked on beside her friend, had a curious lightness and elation. She had resolved on a sacrifice, and the joy of sacrifice was flowing through her being in a flood-tide of satisfaction. As the girls worked rapidly tying their flowers in bunches, laying them on beds of wet moss, covering the fragrant things with parafin paper, and finally labelling the boxes of the "Inasmuch Ten," not a King's Daughter was so radiant as Marion.

She stood long before her little dressing bureau that night, when preparing to retire. She had read her evening portion of Scripture and said her prayers, but through prayer and text, she had heard a voice saying over and over—"Fifty dollars for the Telegus from Marion Wallace, Inverness, Mo."

Satan loves to lead Christians astray, and a little self-praise is too apt to dim our best actions. But Marion did not dream of this as she gathered her hair firmly in her hands, divided and braided it into two broad plaits, then with sharp scissors cut it off. An instant's work, and she stood denuded of her greatest beauty, and transformed from a brilliant butterfly of a girl into a very plain and ordinary grub.

But for this she did not care. She laid the thick braids, so to speak, on the altar of the Lord. Uncle John and Aunt Norah and the other relatives would storm, remarks would be made, it would be long before the loss of hair would grow again, but Marion had made her offering.

Dr. Fay was puzzled, when one day a little later, at the mission rooms, he received a box containing a girl's hair, with a little note consecrating it to the Telegus and their needs. His practical wife saw her way to utilizing the gift, and, in time, not fifty dollars, but five hundred were the outcome of the country girl's impulsive action. Mrs. Fay corresponded with Marion, heard the story of her life, and gave her the sort of friendly counsel from an older woman, of which she was in much need. Then she carried the beautiful hair about and showed it at meetings, and it was finally disposed of to a liberal purchaser, after it had prompted some very generous collections. So the sacrifice was not in vain.

Years afterward Marion understood, however, that her gift had not been a little marred by her self-will and her rebellion against the path her heavenly Father had appointed her. Life's lessons are slowly learned, and we have many a hard one, before we are perfect. For most of us the complete attainment will never come till we reach the pearly gates.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

HOLDING ON AND WINNING.

Years ago a young missionary, because of financial difficulty in his home society, contemplated resigning and returning to his native land. In fact, the mission society had intimated that it could not support him; and it was simply a matter of staving and starving, or returning to enter on other work. When his mother learned the prospects and her son's determination, she wrote from her home in Minnesota:

"John, while you have the Arabic language and [illegible], the [illegible] are, and the mission will not be abandoned."

He accepted his mother's advice, and is still there, a successful missionary in a [illegible] field.

How the "Home" was Saved.

Sister Charlotte Tells of a Remarkable Experience in Rescue Work.

ONE of the best-known and most successful rescue workers in New York City is Mrs. E. G. Draper, better known as "Sister Charlotte." Her work has been principally among fallen women, and so blessed have been her efforts that many have been won from sin and shame to useful Christian lives.

"Sister Charlotte" is a worker of great activity. She is the founder and manager of the Day-Star Industrial Home, 213 W. Twenty-fourth street, New York, which was opened in 1893. Since November of that year over 500 poor, friendless women have been taken into the Home and cared for, physically and spiritually, 350 have been sent out to situations where they are to-day earning honest livings, and many a poor, wayward girl has been restored to parents and friends.

The past summer brought a crisis in the Day-Star Home. A burden of unavoidable debt oppressed it—a debt that would have seemed small to many concerns, but which in Sister Charlotte's eyes was mountainous, and an obstacle to the rescue work. The point was reached where it was thought the Home would have to be closed through lack of resources, when, in answer to the prayers of those who laid the whole burden of its support on the Lord, the incubus was removed. Sister Charlotte tells the experience in her own words:

"At the close of the first year, we found ourselves in debt to the extent of $800. I had done everything myself to make the work a success, and had worried and fretted until I was sick over it. On a Sunday afternood (we were to have our anniversary in the evening), I called the girls together and told them how we stood, and that we owed this money, and unless the Lord showed us favor that night, I felt that the home should be closed. We went from our knees to the meeting. It was a rainy night. Rev. Dr. MacArthur felt very discouraged, and thought that perhaps our meeting would not be a success; but I had reached a point where I felt that, no matter what happened, I could say, 'The Lord's will be done.' The meeting turned out to be a grand one, and after it was over, I asked the deacon what the collection was. He told me he did not know what it was, as there had been some mistake in the pledges. Next day, early in the afternoon I went downtown to call on a friend of the work, and he said, 'I never was so much interested as I was last night to hear the story of your work.' He asked me what the collection was, and I told him I did not know. He rose from his seat and said, 'Sister Charlotte, if all give to you as liberally as I did, you will not have to beg this year.' I then asked him how much he had given, and he said $1200. Our prayers had been answered and the Home was saved. I felt deeply grateful to my Heavenly Father, that he had shown us his favor. I afterwards learned that our own collection was $140. We then went to work with renewed zeal, knowing that we had divine approval, but still our debt of $800 remained, as this money was given monthly. Shortly after this Mr. Huyler and Mr. Crittenton, with some others, were moved to give liberally to the work, and in this way our debt was entirely wiped out."

Mrs Draper, in addition to conducting the Day Star in New York, is manager of the Florence Crittenton Mission in Philadelphia, one of the latest of the great chain of Florence Missions.

AN INFIDEL'S FATE.

Capt. J. H. Sherman, a converted sailor writes this remarkable experience: About the month of July or August, 1884, we were cruising on the West Coast of Africa and fell in with the bark "Seine," and Captain S. We had some acquaintance with the captain, as one of our officers had formerly sailed under his command, and knew him to be an unbeliever. He professed to have no faith in God—though, when I was angry, he used the name of God very freely; so that one day, when he was blaspheming, someone one said to him, "Say, you do believe in God after all?"

Captain S. came on board our vessel, and soon we took our observation and ascertained our position. I had taken an observation shortly before coming on board, and our reckonings did not agree; my reckoning made us sixty miles nearer the African coast than his. Evidently somebody's chronometer was badly out of order, but he was sure that his was correct. He told us, however, that he had fallen in with the bark "Sunbeam" shortly before, and that their reckoning made them forty-five miles nearer land than his did. Here, then, were two chronometers against his, and some one must be in serious error, and it might be wrong, and that fact was enough to make any prudent man careful. But he was confident that he was right; and he said that on a certain day which he named, he would be off Little Fish Bay. We parted; he went his way and we went ours. After he was gone I talked with my wife about his self-confidence and presumption, but he followed his reckoning, and we ours. We, however, approached the shore with great care, thinking possibly we might be wrong, and taking every precaution to avoid danger and wreck.

The next news we had of the "Seine" was, it was wrecked and a total loss. The vessel ran ashore at night on the African coast. The wreck, if I remember rightly, was attended with loss of life. Captain S. reached Little Fish Bay, but not at the time he named nor in the manner he intended. He reached it in one of the boats, leaving his vessel and cargo to the mercy of the rocks and waves. On examining our chronometer when we reached the land, we found that it was exactly right. The captain's chronometer had played him false, and caused him loss. Many an infidel and sceptic, like Captain S. is trusting to his own methods of reckoning for safety and rejecting the only guide and compass that can direct him safely and surely to the eternal haven.

A POLITE SAVAGE.

Bishop C. C. Penick, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, formerly missionary to Africa, tells this incident. It is hardly necessary to say that the good man is recognized by boys as soon as he appears and, when he passes them without speaking, they know something is wrong.

Passing through the streets one day in deep thought, he met a boy with a stick of candy. The sweet treasure had not yet been tasted, but, as soon as the lad saw his friend, he broke the stick in two and handed half to the Bishop, who accepted it without a word of thanks or recognition. For a moment the giver looked up in wonder; then, as a shadow of disappointment came over his face, he said, gently, rather to call the Bishop's attention to the fact than to offer a rebuke.

"You the most [illegible] I the world."

The African lad's example might be followed by many white-skinned boys with advantages. Of course the Bishop, who would doubtless have loved him in another moment, felt more grieved than offended.

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

NADJA BENT OVER HER FRIEND AND KISSED HER

CHAPTER XV.

A Friend in Need.

NOTHING could have been more welcome to the desolate, friendless Nadja, than the kindly, almost affectionate greeting of the lady who spoke to her in the cathedral. As they sat together under the elm, Nadja nestled close to her new friend. They were alone there, and the stranger lifted her veil. The features uncovered were those of the Countess Olga Nirotska. Looking steadfastly at her Nadja thought she had never seen so beautiful a lady.

Slavo she had seen women who were not peasants—the wives of officials passing through; she had also had a glimpse now and again of ladies in the steamers that plied sometimes on the river, but it was only since her arrival in Kief that she found herself near enough to one to speak to her, and during her afternoon's wanderings she had wished once or twice to speak to ladies who looked kindly on her fair open face. Perhaps they could tell her where she could live and where to seek for work. And here was one of the Kief ladies, who had not waited to be spoken to, and was speaking words of melting kindness to her, offering help and calling her sister. Nadja looked at her again for confidence and support, and got them.

"Don't be afraid, child"—the Countess was only two years her senior, but she was a woman of the world, and Nadja a simple peasant girl. "Don't be frightened. Speak to me. I do wish to help you."

Nadja was not frightened, perplexed and ashamed, perhaps, but not frightened.

"You are not a pilgrim, I think," the Countess continued, seeing her hesitancy, "at least if you are you must be from some village in this province. You are dressed just like some of my own village girls. What is your name?"

"Nadyejda."

"Ah, that's a good name, and I trust there are no more troubles to worry you. Cheer up, dear. Where do you live?"

"I live nowhere. I came to Kief this morning with some pilgrims whom I overtook on the road, and we are all staying together over there." She pointed in the direction of the hospice.

"Do your father or mother know you are here?"

"They are dead," said Nadja, her eyes filling with tears.

"And will you return home with the pilgrims?"

"Oh no, no, I cannot, you know I cannot. I will stop here. I must stay here; I have no home."

"Well, don't cry, sister, don't cry." For a moment or two the Countess sat thoughtful regarding the girl, and at last a great pity filled her heart. "You shall go home with me, Nadyejda. I have a house here. I won't bother you with more questions. You need not tell me anything unless you like. Let us go together to the hospice, where your friends are staying, and I'll tell them that you are going to stay with me, and that they are not to be uneasy."

Nadji seized the beautiful hand that rested on her knee, and kissed it in a tumult of emotion and gratitude. She did not know who her benefactor was, she only felt she was good. She felt as though she were going home: as though this lovely, dark-eyed lady had been sent by God to help and rescue her.

"I'll come. You are very kind to me. Thank God!" was all she muttered.

Together they left the grassy space with trees, and went out under the campanile and across the dusty square. They made their way through the city to where the pilgrims' lodgings were, and Nadja pointed out the rooms occupied by old Makari's people. It was Makari himself who came to see the Countess. They had all been wondering, he said, what had become of the girl, and feared she had lost her way. Yes, he was glad she had found a friend who promised to be good to her. She was a lonely girl, said old Makari, and a beautiful one, too, he added, with a smile to the other pilgrims who were listening. "I told her she was a grand duchess in disguise. Don't be angry, little soul, and give me your hand, and don't forget the pilgrims.

Nadja embraced the women who had been so kind to her, kissing them on both cheeks, imploring them to remember her always. The Countess, who took to the pilgrims at once, shook them all by the hand, and Nadja, touched to the heart, and utterly heedless, flung her arms round her new friend's neck and wildly kissed her, too.

These two women, alike in their strong emotions, and alike in their capacity for sacrifice, felt powerfully drawn to one another. The Countess took the unprotected peasant girl home with her, and told her household that Nadja was to be her maid, and that they must all be kind to her.

Nadja often enough longed to tell her everything, and this she might have done had she not speedily discovered that the Countess was a near neighbor to Slavo, as neighborhoods go in Russia. To a stranger, ignorant of Slavo, she would have been perhaps in time more open; to one who, notwithstanding the complete affection she showed her, was presumably not ignorant of her home, and certainly knew the Alekhins, she dreaded to tell her story.

Nor did Nadja of course know everything that the Countess could tell. She only knew that her mistress had arrived in Kief from Krasnaya Balka a day or two before her, that she had only been a very few days in the country, and that previously she had lived in St. Petersburg. If there was anything else to know it was told to Nadja one morning when she was dressing her mistress.

"I could not stay cooped up in the country. I thought I could. I thought I could devote my whole life to my people, and perhaps after the war I will."

The Countess paused for a moment, and Nadja saw that her face was very thoughtful and that a strange light of tenderness and love was in her eyes.

"Perhaps after the war," she repeated, "I'll live in Krasnaya Balka for good. But nearly all the friends I knew in St. Petersburg are going to the front; at least my best friends are—those I care for most, and I felt compelled, Nadja, to be somewhere where I could hear about them and pray for them."

She held up her face, and Nadja stooped and kissed her, stroking her hair.

"Have you any friends at the war, Nadja?"

Nadja, although now with more command of herself, blushed a fiery red and said she had.

"And don't you pray for them?"

"Yes, I pray for them."

"Nadja," said the Countess softly, "do you love him very much?"

The whispered "Yes," only Nadja herself heard, but the Countess saw her lips move.

On another occasion, a month or so after their arrival in Kief, Nadja and her mistress were sitting together under the shady trees of St. Sophia's. Nadja's thoughts had gone back to her first visit to the old cathedral, and all the vivid impressions that had been crowded in on her soul seemed to return now, some strangely blunted or blurred, some as clear and keen as at first. What were those words under the stooping, world-worn monks? Ah, that had never been absent from her mind, that tender invitation. She turned to the Countess and told her, and together they entered the cathedral.

"Come unto me," read the countess, "all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

They sat there on the stone seat, and the message sank deep into both their souls, and gave them rest and courage. It was the Countess who first broke a silence that had been filled with celestial messages to their hearts.

"Nadja," she whispered, and her great dark eyes were solemn and clear, "I believe we have both 'come.' We are at his feet, dear. Your burden is heavier than mine. He will give you rest—the Christ, Nadja. Has he not said that the great gates of heaven shall be open for those who have wept upon earth? 'Blessed are the poor in spirit,' 'Blessed are they that mourn.' Shall we not trust him?"

Nadja said nothing, but her heart with its heavy burdens was lightening, and there was already in her soul the spring and the rebound of one that had begun to hope. The dawn of a new life was breaking upon her. But she said nothing. She could not say anything.

"Nadja," whispered her friend, "have you ever heard of people they call Stundists? My overseer is one, and there are a few in Krasnaya Balka. Do you know what they say? They say that only he saves us—that all our pilgrimages are vain—and that all our prayers before all these icons, all our crossings, all our kissing the holy relics, is idolatry. The overseer—he is a German—told me the other day that the New Testament contains what God expects us to do, and that if we go beyond that, or fall short of it, it is wrong. Sometimes, Nadja, I half think they are right. They are certainly not wrong. Have you Stundists in your village also?"

"Yes," answered Nadja hesitatingly. "And they are very good people; but I know very little about them. Father did not like them."

"One of the best men I ever knew was one of their preachers; a young man. The day I left Krasnaya Balka I heard he had gone away to the war with a dear friend of mine, Nadja. I wish you knew him. He lives in Slavo, not far from me."

The Countess noticed the deathly pallor of the girl's face and her silence, but Nadja had been far from strong lately, and she feared to distress her with further questions. Drawing her tenderly towards her, they slowly left the church together.

When the summer began, Olga and Nadja removed from the hot city to a quiet place among the pine woods. Some months passed, and let us hasten over them. They were sad months of illness, and care, and anxiety. The high-born lady served the lowly peasant's daughter with an ineffable tenderness and devotion. Through Nadja's dark hours of fever she was by her side, rendering more than a sister's love, and when the crisis was passed and the hitherto ebbing tide of life turned to a slow and uncertain flow, her soul filled to overflowing with ever-recurring waves of gratitude to God, and purest human happiness. Through the long evenings of the late summer they sat together in their little cottage with the windows open towards the western pine forests and the radiant sky, and while Nadja lay back in her shawls and breathed the ordorous air Olga sat by, and read simple and beautiful things that drew the girl from her reveries of the past, and helped to fix her mind more on the present and on the interests and duties of the future.

Some strange words of terrible meaning to the Countess had been uttered wildly by the sick girl during the paroxysms of her fever. Was it the mere, meaningless frenzy of delirium, or what could it mean? Slavo—she spoke the name of the village quite distinctly. Who was this Vladimir who had forsaken her so cruelly? Who was this Mikhail with the New Testament? And she had raved of the ferry and of the river, and of some one called Grisha. Oh, it was too horrible, and she could not believe it. It was some other Vladimir. It was a common enough name.

And so when Nadja was stronger, and the color slowly returning to her cheeks, and they could go out together in the woods to gather autumn berries and the crimsoning leaves of maple and wild-vine, the Countess told her of her delirious words and asked for her confidence. Nadja humbly asked forgiveness for having kept anything a secret from one who had been both sister and angel to her.

It was down in a ferny hollow with russet oaks around them that these two women got to know one another's heart; each, as she knew her own knew the heart of the other, its hopes, fears, joys, sorrows. It was as though some galling burden had been lifted off Nadja's heart, and she found herself for the first time looking steadfastly and fearlessly at her friend, her sister, as she had learned to call her, mistress no longer.

When the Countess felt that Nadja was gaining in strength she used to talk to her often of the army at the front. She had the newspapers regularly sent up to her from Kief, and the two women used to follow the varying fortunes of the troops all through the hopes, the overthrows, the fluctuations of that critical summer. Olga told her friend about the crossing of the great river, and how the division to which the Alekhins were attached had distinguished itself. She told her about the gallant hero-general in the Balkans, and the women's hearts were now roused by the glory of the cause, and the deeds of bravery that were done, now melting for the sick and tired, when they thought of the pain of the men's wounds and the weariness of their marching. As time went on, and they heard of Gourko's retreat into the Shipka Pass, and of the desperate fighting that followed, of reverse after reverse following the Russian arms, their hearts sank within them.

One evening, early in September, the Countess with pale face read to Nadja some reports from the seat of war sent her by a friend in Kief. Soon it was the suffering wounded they were thinking of, the villages and field-hospitals crammed with them, the streams of them all bleeding, and badly-bandaged, and wretched, wending their painful way along the rough roads, jolting in the springless wagons, the badly wounded lying mostly where they fell until the Bashi Bazouks came. When they heard that the Medical Service had so terrible a strain upon it, that it was in places completely disorganized, that there were no nurses in the right places, the same idea seemed to strike them both at once.

"We must go to the front; it is our duty. We must no longer idle here."

Those last days in Kief were full of the bustle of preparation. Countess Olga with her powerful friends easily arranged all preliminaries. Nadja was eager, and hopeful.

"Ah," said the Countess, the night before they left, "I used to long for high tasks, because I could not recognize the height of those ready at hand. My nearest and plainest duties seemed not heroic enough."

Nadja partly understood what she meant.

It was a beautiful evening late in autumn when the two nurses in their dark brown dresses, with the great red cross fastened on their breasts, found themselves on the railway platform departing for Bulgaria. There was bustle and excitement all around—anxious officials in uniforms, officers, surgeons, nurses, all bound for the South; there was weeping and wringing of hands. A croud of her acquaintances had come to wish the Countess and her friend God-speed. They were all shaking hands for the last time when an old monk who had hung back on the outskirts of the crowd came forward and lifted his hands. All the men present uncovered, the women clasped their hands.

"May the dear Christ," he solemnly said, "whose servants ye are, guide you and shield you from danger, and bring you back rich in the riches of his divine grace. Amen and Amen."

It was the old Sacristan of St. Sophia's.

THE CLUE TO THE VISION.

The Explanation Given by the Angel to Daniel a Clue to the Interpretation of the Latter Visions of the Prophet.

BY GEO. A. PEMBER, M. A.

THE commission for which Nehemiah asked the king (Neh. 2: 5), is that which fixes the beginning of the seventy sevens. It differs from all the other edicts, in that it was not concerned with land or temple but with the city and the wall. The twenty-fifth verse of Daniel 9, then, brings us to the end of the Four Hundred and Eighty-third Year, leaving but Seven more of the Four Hundred and Ninety to be fulfilled. Hence we may reasonably expect to find in the next verse information on one of two points, according to circumstances—either something respecting the final Seven of Years if it was to follow immediately; or, if there was to be any break between the Four Hundred and Eighty-third and Four Hundred and Eighty-four Year, a notice of the intervening time or events. The latter is what we do find, together with a hint as to the length of the interruption. And the first mentioned intervening event is the cutting off of the Messiah.

Accordingly, on the last day of the Sixty-ninth Seven, the Lord Jesus moved towards Jerusalem; and, after halting on the brow of Olivet to bewail the city, passed under the gates and through through the streets that were so soon to be levelled with the dust, and offered himself as her King to the daughter of Zion. But alas! as soon as a momentary enthusiasm had evaporated, she saw no beauty in him that she should desire him. He was despised and rejected: and, in a few short days, the jubilant cry, "Blessed is the King that cometh in the Name of the Lord!" had been exchanged for shouts of "Crucify him! Crucify him!" then, at length, "the Anointed One was cut off."

And "there was nothing for him:" none of those glories which were to surround the person of the Messiah. Instead of appearing as the King of kings and Lord of lords, he was found in the form of a servant. And so far was he from possessing a Kingdom above all, and an everlasting dominion, that, during his life, he had not where to lay his head, and was soon cut off altogether from the land of the living. Here, then, is the beginning of an interval, which separates the Four Hundred and Eighty-three Years from the final Seven.

Then the prophecy speaks of another intervening event, namely, the vengeance that should fall upon the murderers of the Messiah. Both their City and its Sanctuary, Jerusalem and the Temple, should be destroyed. This prediction was fulfilled about forty years after the death of Christ. But, again, there is no mention of the missing Seven Years: the interval is represented as still continuing.

We have, therefore, mention of three events, the first of which, the cutting off of the Messiah, took place four days after the close of the Sixty-ninth Seven. It would, therefore, have happened within the Seventieth, had the final period followed immediately. But the second, the destruction of until forty years later, and, therefore, could not have been included within the next seven years; while the third, war and the de-

A HUMBLE CHRISTIAN SECRET.

The joy which the presence of Jesus gives in the heart makes itself evident in the whole life. Even the poorest and humblest may have this great joy. A correspondent, writing from Paris, gives this little incident, which beautifully illustrates this idea:

A bronzed old fruit-woman sat behind her stand in the terrace overlooking the garden of Versailles near one of the entrances to the palace. I noticed that among the fruit syrups and juice there were no wine bottles and called my companion's attention to it. In response to a question the woman earnestly said, "No, indeed, I sell no wine. It is bad stuff and and brings much misfortune!" We were delighted to find a comrade so unexpectedly and in such a guise, and told her, "We are friends, for we wear the white ribbon for that very reason." Her rugged, earnest face beamed under the broad bonnet as she ejaculated with true French enthusiasm, "You then propagate good doctrines? Ah, that is right, that is what the good 'Seigneur' would like us to do." "Then you know, too, the 'Seigneur,' the Saviour, Jesus Christ?" "Ah, madame. What should I do without? It is a long time that I have known him but well! well! for thank God, I have the conscience at peace and that is the best in this world. For if in this world we know not the good 'Seigneur' what therefore remains to us? Nothing but the worst of miseries, is it not?" Before leaving we pinned the white ribbon on her shawl that others of our party might recognize a kindred spirit in the unassuming, hard working fruit vender who had so well learned the Christian's secret of a happy life.

AWAKENED BY A TRACT.

Early in 1819, while waiting to see a patient, a young physician in New York took up and read a tract lying in the room. The title was "The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions; and the Ability and Duty of the Churches respecting them." The tract aroused inquiry; and, on reaching home, the doctor spoke to his wife of the question that had arisen in his mind. Instead of turning from the subject, she joined her husband in trying to learn if the millions had any claims on her. As the two studied they became more convinced that they had duties and responsibilities that could not well be laid on others. The result of their deliberation and prayer appeared when, June 9th, 1819, against appeal, argument and opposition, they set out for Ceylon, and later India, as foreign missionaries.

For thirty years the wife, and for thirty-six the husband, labored among the heathen, and then went to their reward. What they did to arouse their countrymen in behalf of the heathen, and what they did for the benighted race is history. Apart from that they left behind seven sons and two daughters. Each of these sons married, and with their wives and both sisters, gave themselves to the same mission work. Already have several grandchildren of the first missionary become missionaries in India. And thus far thirty of that family—the Scudders—have given 520 years to India missions, and all because of that little tract.

MISSIONS IN MADAGASCAR.

The French Successes and the Prospe of the Missionaries.

FROM the cabled reports the French expedition Madagascar, it appe that Antananarivo, t capital, fell after a sh struggle on Sept. 30. T French General is ported to be in poss sion, and the Queen's husband, who v Prime Minister, has been banished. A orous protectorate is to be established France, but the island is not to be anne and the Queen is to nomin reign. The treatment to wh our ex-consul, Waller, was jected indicates what the Fre policy will be. All foreign will be treated as hostiles the missionaries will be no ception to the rule. Their p ence may be tolerated, but will be the objects of suspic especially if they were in country before the French vasion.

From recent letters from missionaries and from rep s in the English journals, "Missionary Herald" forms following estimate of the si tion: The London Missio Society's correspondent in M agascar writes on the subj "Notwithstanding the l ing of French troops on shores of this island, Chris work of all kinds goes on ir interior, and to a large ex on the coast, with hardly interruption. It is remark how little excitement ther amongst the people gener No doubt many are anx about the future, and a y earnest spirit of prayer se s everywhere manifest; but t e is, at present, at least, not g like panic or any irritated ing against foreigners: and s surely is due to the indire s well as direct influences Christianity upon the M gasy. Meetings of all k s for religious and philanthr objects are held; for orphan s and Christian Endeavor S ties; for Dorcas Societies help to the soldiers who h e gone to the war; for sen g them preachers and help and for keeping up native sionary work in distant pa the island, as well as ser es at the opening of new chur s. A large and handsome w building has just been co ed by the Analakely cong tion in the capital, and was dedicate divine worship in the presence of the Q en and Court. Our congregations have s dily increased for some months past, a it is sometimes pathetic to hear the pra s for God's protection which are const made, especially as there is hardly eve y angry feelings expressed towards ir enemies.

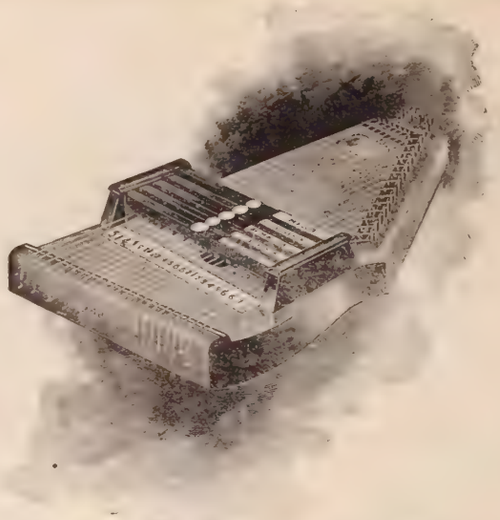
THE AUTOHARP.



Autoharp Cases.
Autoharp Hammers.
Autoharp Bags.
Autoharp Strings.
Autoharp Brushes.

Take your choice. While these Autoharps are only two of our many varieties illustrated in our beautiful story, "How the Autoharp Captured the Family" (sent free to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers), they are the popular ones. The prices are just right, and the capacity of the instruments is such that they are sure to give satisfaction. We guarantee satisfaction or money returned.

Why should you get an Autoharp! Because you can learn to play the popular music—Operas, Hymns, Waltzes, Marches, Galops, Mazurkas, Schottisches, Vocals, College Songs—almost at sight. No teacher is necessary, as our instruction book is complete. Our music is a new figure notation. You do not have to know a single note of the old system. It is easily tuned, and keeps in tune a long time. Never gets out of order.

Style 2 3-4 (Upper illustration). Two keys—F and C allowing beautiful modulation. It has 23 strings and five bars producing the following five chords: C, F and Bb Major and C and G Seventh. Its appearance is handsome—imitation ebony bars and bar supports, forming a contrast to the light redwood sounding board. It measures 18 1-2 inches long by 10 inches wide. Packed in a nice box, including instruction book containing 22 pieces of music, a music rack, imitation tortoise shell pick, brass spiral pick, and a tuning key. Price, $5.00.

Style 2 7-8 (Lower illustration). Two keys, F and C, with the relative Minors, allowing many most beautiful modulations and musical effects. Has 28 strings, seven bars, producing the following seven chords: C, F and Bb Major, C and G Seventh, D and A Minor. In appearance same as 2 3-4. The size, however, is larger, measuring 20 inches long and 11 1-2 inches broad. This gives more volume, and as it has more strings and chord bars, should be very seriously considered. Packed in a nice box, including instruction book containing 24 pieces of music, a music rack, imitation tortoise shell pick, brass spiral pick, and a tuning key. Price, $7.50.

The Lungs and their Disea

We commence to-day the publication of of extracts from the lectures of the ve specialist in lung complaints, Dr. Robert H this city. They will be continued from week and embody everything of interest portant for the public to know regarding t and their diseases.

No. 1.

Now that we have the means of curing t with certainty, in most cases, if only a time, it becomes of the utmost importan people know what are the diseases which breathing organs—how they arise, in what lead to consumption; how consumption ca vented and the principles which govern it treatment. The diseases which affect ou ing are: Catarrh of the Head and Throat, and La Grippe, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Pneumonia, and Tubercolosis or Consump

All of these, except consumption, are rectly by congestion or engorgement of the ages and lungs. Cold is the most comm such congestion, but it may also arise fr ing an atmosphere charged with dust or which irritate the mucous membrane of th sages. When the external surface of the chilled the blood is driven to the internal this rush of blood to a part produces what by the term congestion. Unless it be quickl the blood lingers and stagnates in the causing first irritation and ending in inf The part which becomes the most inflam mines the name of the disease. If it be and throat it is called Catarrh or influen top of the windpipe, it becomes Laryngitis if the air tubes of the lungs, we call it Br Asthma, according to the form it takes; involves not only the lining of the tub whole tissue entering into the formation o it becomes Pneumonia. All of these dise in an acute form and may end fatally in or weeks. The deaths from acute Pneum Bronchitis number many thousands eac this city alone. Most of such attacks, ho their acute character and continue in form in which, if the patient's vitality be may linger for months or years before Consumption, which is the natural and evitable ending of all chronic inflammation passages and lungs.

The first effect of the chronic inflamma mucous lining of the nose, throat and tubes is to alter the natural mucous sec ducing at first a thick, tenacious phl clogs the tubes and diminishes the breathing. As the inflammation becom veterate it abrades and destroys the epi ducing ulcerations, after which the matte ated changes to a mixture of mucous a bined.

All this occurs and continues for shorter period, attended by cough and often by hectic fever and night sweats, a ally by spittings of blood and loss of flesh before the setting in of Consumption.

In my next I will explain what Con and how it engrafts itself upon the chro surfaces of the lungs.

A GENEROUS OFFER. $200 IN GOLD GIVEN.

R. H. WOODWARD COMPANY, Baltimore, Md., are making a very generous offer of $200.00 to anyone who will sell within three months 200 copies of "Talks to Children About Jesus." This is one of the most popular books of recent years. Agents often sell from 10 to 15 copies a day. It contains a great many beautiful illustrations, and is sold at a remarkably low price. They give credit and pay freight, and send complete canvassing outfit for 35c. It is just the book to be sold for the Holidays. We also offer an Estey Organ, retail price $270.00 to anyone who will sell 110 books in three months. It is an excellent opportunity for a Church or Society to secure one of these organs. A $100.00 bicycle to be given for selling 80 copies in two months, or gold watch for selling 60 copies in one month. This premium is in addition to the regular commission. Agents who do not get any of the premiums are given a liberal commission. They also make a specialty of other books and Bibles for Xmas Holidays. Write them immediately.

THE VALUE OF CHRISTIAN SINGING

To the Christian, singing should go a long way toward the uplifting of the soul, and the better it is done the greater will be the effect upon the mind. If congregational singing is such an important part of the church service, it certainly should be encouraged by all concerned. The indifference of the congregation might be overcome by the pastor making a special effort to impress upon his hearers that it is their privilege to show their gratitude to God by offering up praise and thanksgiving to him with heart and soul and voice.

Timely Warning.

The great success of the chocolate preparations of the house of Walter Baker & Co. (established in 1780) has led to the placing on the market many misleading and unscrupulous imitations of their name, labels, and wrappers. Walter Baker & Co. are the oldest and largest manufacturers of pure and high-grade Cocoas and Chocolates on this continent. No chemicals are used in their manufactures.

Consumers should ask for, and be sure that they get, the genuine Walter Baker & Co.'s goods.

YIELD AT ONCE TO

BOOTHS HYOMEI MARK "DRI-AYR"

(Pronounced Hi-o-my.)

The Australian Dry-Air Treatment by Inhalation of Hay Fever, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Etc.

MASS. CHARITABLE EYE AND EAR INFIRMARY,
No. 176 Charles Street,
BOSTON, MASS., February 11, 1895.

I wonderfully surprised with the result of your Hyomei for bronchitis and bleeding of the lungs; and in case of dull, heavy cough, with expectoration of adhesive matter, it acts like magic. Hyomei, used by our patients with the Inhaler well charged, has never failed to produce good results. It is also the greatest thing in the world for catarrh. I can recommend it to all.
Yours truly, J. A. GOGGINS.

Air, thoroughly charged with Hyomei, is inhaled through the Pocket Inhaler at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air cells, is slowly exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, inexpensive and gives immediate relief. It stops all spasmodic coughing instantly, clears the voice, expands the lungs, and increases the breathing capacity.

BOOTH'S POCKET INHALER OUTFIT,
Complete, by Mail, $1.00, consisting of Pocket Inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber, beautifully polished, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are skeptical send your address, and my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei does cure. Are you open to conviction?

R. T. BOOTH, 18 East 20th St., N. Y.

Is the making of a pie. The making of a crisp crust depends largely upon the shortening. Use COTTOLENE, the new vegetable shortening, instead of lard, and sogginess will be an unknown element in your pastry. Cottolene should always be economically used—two-thirds as much Cottolene as you would ordinarily use of lard or butter, being ample to produce the most desirable results. The saving in a year represents a considerable item. There are many imitations of COTTOLENE; you should therefore be careful to get the genuine.

Sold everywhere in tins, with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by were persecuted for their pains simply because men wouldn't trust what they hadn't previously proved.

But we know better in these days, and are willing to hear the testimony of those who have been cured of all sorts of disease by Electropoise, and having heard, to believe the facts enough to try the remedy.

Because Electropoise re-inforces the life principle it is efficient in all forms of disease, so that it isn't the remedy that cures after all, but rather renewed vital power conquering disease.

REACHING CHRIST IN MANY LANDS.

The American Board's Eighty-sixth Anniversary — Its Extensive Work, Early History, and Some of its Devoted Missionaries.

CHURCHES of every denomination, and individual Christians, are concerned in the statement made and reiterated with emphasis at the recent meeting in Brooklyn of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, that the chief impediment to the propagation of the Gospel, is the lack of funds. There are redundant opportunities for obeying the Master's command to preach the Gospel to every creature; men and women are offering themselves for the work in larger number than ever before, but there is no money available for the necessary expenses. There are, it appears, about a thousand millions of the world's population that are often nominally Christian. This figure does not include the enormous number of people who have given Christian name, but are outside the churches. It is made up of Mohammedans, Buddhists, Hindoos and other people, who are opposed to Christianity through ignorance of what it really is; and of savages who have not yet heard the Gospel preached. About one tenth of this thousand millions live in the lands to which the American Board sends its missionaries, and nearly all are in lands contiguous to them, and easily accessible to the Board's agencies. The question the Board had to consider was not how to reach the peoples and carry to them the Gospel message, but whether it should curtail its work and withdraw missionaries from the fields, because of its inability to support them.

The necessity for considering this question has not arisen from any failure of missionary operations. In the eighty-five years that the Board has been in the field glorious work has been done by men whom it has sent to heathen lands. Twenty distinct missions have been organized for work in Africa, China, Japan, India, Asiatic Turkey, Micronesia and other regions. In these, regular churches have been planted to the number of 461, besides over sixteen hundred preaching stations at which the Gospel has been regularly proclaimed either by the missionaries or native teachers whom they have trained. The early records of the work are incomplete, but those obtainable show that at least 127,639 persons have been led in these places to accept Christianity and make personal confession of faith in Christ. Besides this, the Board has established sixteen theological colleges in its various fields for the training of native preachers and 128 schools in which over fifty thousand children and young people are now receiving a sound and practical Christian education. So much has already been accomplished and the work is still going on. There are now 572 missionaries in the various missions and they have, as assistants in their labors, 3,107 natives acting either as preachers or teachers under the direction of the missionaries. During the course of its history the Board has sent out 2,115 missionaries many of whom have died on their fields having given their best years, their health and all they held dear, even life itself, to the work of preaching the Gospel to the heathen.

The cost of doing so large and extensive a work is necessarily heavy. Last year, with the most rigid economy, and without entering on any new fields, the cost of maintaining the missions was $661,885, while the home expenses incurred in carrying on the necessary administrative organization and printing the literature required in the work, brought the total expenditure up to $715,232. During the eighty-five years in which the work has been carried on, over twenty-eight million dollars have been expended. Of late years the income of the Board has not covered its expenditure. Happily two large legacies came into its hands, which prevented serious embarrassment, but these will be exhausted this year and thus the question of future development has become urgent. The receipts from donations last year amounted to $516,003, which was nearly $200,000 less than the expenditure. Toward this several legacies were received and part of the legacy before mentioned, was applied, and these, with the interest on the permanent fund, met the deficiency and left the Board at the close of its financial year owing less than at the close of the previous year by some sixteen hundred dollars. But although the Board did not increase, but slightly decreased its debt, its balance is still on the wrong side of the ledger to the amount of $114,632.

The responsibility for so large an indebtedness has been keenly felt by Dr. Richard S. Storrs, the President of the Board and by his colleagues, and this was expressed at the annual meeting in Brooklyn by them all. It was, however obvious that no further economy was possible and there was therefore no mode of decreasing expenditure but to decrease the number of mission-stations. Every one was reluctant to take any step backward, so attention was turned to the other side of the account, with the hope that the income might be increased. A committee was organized to try to extinguish the debt and one anonymous donor made the munificent offer of $25,000, if the entire debt could be liquidated before a specified date. Several other pledges were made, which encouraged the Board to hope that by the end of another year it would be relieved of all its indebtedness. It is obvious, however, that a permanent increase of income must be secured, otherwise the debt will reappear and require another spasmodic effort for its extinction. That such an increase of income should not be a difficult achievement is evident from the fact that the membership of the Congregational Churches is fully half a million. Thus a dollar and a half from each member annually, would suffice to provide the Board with the income it requires for its present expenditure. That sum certainly is not too much to expect from any one who knows the value of the Gospel and desires to take a part in sending it to those who have it not.

There was something pathetic in these pleadings for money at the annual meeting. It reminds one of the situation depicted by Dibert in his painting of "The Missionary's Story," in which the missionary is show-

MISSIONARIES OF THE AMERICAN BOARD PRESENT AT THE RECENT ANNIVERSARY

ALL HEAVEN LOOKING ON.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Heb. 12: 1, "Seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

IN this my opening sermon in the National Capital I give you heartiest Christian salutation. I bethink myself of the privilege of standing in this historic church so long presided over by one of the most remarkable men of the century. There are plenty of good ministers beside Doctor Sunderland, but I do not know of any man except himself with enough brain to have stood successfully and triumphantly forty-three years in this conspicuous pulpit. Long distant be the year when that Gospel chieftain shall put down the silver trumpet with which he has marshalled the hosts of Israel, or sheathe the sword with which he has struck such mighty blows for God and righteousness. I come to you with the same Gospel that he has preached and to join you in all kinds of work for making the world better, and I hope to see you all in your own homes and have you all come and see me, but don't all come at once; and without any preliminary discourses as to what I propose to do, I begin here and now to cheer you with the thought that all heaven is sympathetically looking on. "Seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

Crossing the Alps by the Mont Cenis Pass, or through the Mont Cenis Tunnel, you are in a few hours set down at Verona, Italy, and in a few minutes begin examining one of the grandest ruins of the world—the Amphitheatre. The whole building sweeps around you in a circle. You stand in the arena where the combat was once fought or the race run, and on all sides the seats rise, tier above tier, until you count forty elevations, or galleries, as I shall see fit to call them, in which sat the senators, the kings, and the twenty-five thousand excited spectators. At the sides of the arena, and under the galleries, are the cages in which the lions and tigers are kept without food, until, frenzied with hunger and thirst, they are let out upon some poor victim, who, with his sword and alone, is condemned to meet them. I think that Paul himself once stood in such a place, and that it was not only figuratively, but literally, that he had "fought with beasts at Ephesus."

The gala-day has come. From all the world the people are pouring into Verona. Men, women, and children, orators and senators, great men and small, thousands upon thousands come, until the first gallery is full, and the second, the third, the fourth, the fifth—all the way up to the twentieth, all the way up to the thirtieth, all the way up to the fortieth. Every place is filled. Immensity of audience sweeping the great circle. Silence! The time for the contest has come. A Roman official leads forth the victim into the arena. Let him get his sword, with firm grip, into his right hand. The twenty-five thousand sit breathlessly watching. I hear the door at the side of the arena creak open. Out plunges the half-starved lion, his tongue athirst for blood, and, with a roar that brings all the galleries to their feet, he rushes against the sword of the combatant. Do you know how strong a stroke a man will strike when his life depends upon the first thrust of his blade? The wild beast, lame and bleeding, slinks back toward the side of the arena; then, rallying his wasting strength, he comes up with fiercer eye and more terrible roar than ever, only to be driven back with a fatal wound, while the combatant comes in with stroke after stroke, until the monster is dead at his feet, and the twenty-five thousand people clap their hands and utter a shout that makes the city tremble.

Sometimes the audience came to see a race; sometimes to see gladiators fight each other, until the people, compassionate for the fallen, turned their thumbs up as an appeal that the vanquished be spared; and sometimes the combat was with wild beasts.

To an amphitheatrical audience Paul refers when he says: "We are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

The fact is, that every Christian man has a lion to fight. Yours is a bad temper. The gates of the arena have been opened, and this tiger has come out to destroy your soul. It has lacerated you with many a wound. You have been thrown by it time and again, but in the strength of God you have arisen to drive it back. I verily believe you will conquer. I think that the temptation is getting weaker and weaker. You have given it so many wounds that the prospect is that it will die, and you shall be victor, through Christ. Courage, brother! Do not let the sands of the arena drink the blood of your soul!

Your lion is the passion for strong drink. You may have contended against it twenty years; but it is strong of body and thirsty of tongue. You have tried to fight it back with broken bottle or empty wine-flask. Nay! that is not the weapon. With one horrible roar he will seize thee by the throat and rend thee limb from limb. Take this weapon, sharp and keen—reach up and get it from God's armory: the Sword of the Spirit. With that thou mayest drive him back and conquer!

But why specify, when every man and woman has a lion to fight. If there be one here who has no besetting sin, let him speak out, for him have I offended. If you have not fought the lion, it is because you have let the lion eat you up. This very moment the contest goes on. The Trajan celebration, where ten thousand gladiators fought, and eleven thousand wild beasts were slain, was not so terrific a struggle as that which at this moment goes on in many a soul. That combat was for the life of the body; this is for the life of the soul. That was with wild beasts from the jungle; this is with the roaring lion of hell.

Men think, when they contend against an evil habit, that they have to fight it all alone. No! They stand in the centre of an immense circle of sympathy. Paul had been reciting the names of Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Joseph, Gideon, and Barak, and then says: "Being compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

Before I get through, I will show you that you fight in an arena, around which circle, in galleries above each other, all the kindling eyes and all the sympathetic hearts of the ages; and at every victory gained there comes down the thundering applause of a great multitude that no man can number. "Being compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses."

On the first elevation of the ancient amphitheatre, on the day of a celebration, sat Tiberius, or Augustus, or the reigning king. So, in the great arena of spectators that watch our struggles, and in the first divine gallery, as I shall call it, sits our King, one Jesus. On his head are many crowns! The Roman emperor got his place by cold-blooded conquests; but our King hath come to his place by the broken hearts healed, and the tears wiped away, and the souls redeemed. The Roman emperor sat, with folded arms, indifferent as to whether the swordsman or the lion beat; but our King's sympathies are all with us. Nay, unheard-of condescension! I see him come down from the gallery into the arena to help us in the fight, shouting, until all up and down his voice is heard: "Fear not! I will help thee! I will strengthen thee by the right hand of my power!"

They gave to the men in the arena, in the olden time, food to thicken their blood, so that it would flow slowly, and that for a longer time the people might gloat over the scene. But our King has no pleasure in our wounds, for we are bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, blood of his blood.

> In all the anguish of our heart,
> The Man of Sorrows bore a part.

Once, in the ancient amphitheatre, a lion with one paw caught the combatant's sword, and with his other paw caught his shield. The man took his knife from his girdle and slew the beast. The king, sitting in the gallery, said, "That was not fair; the lion must be slain by a sword." Other lions were turned out, and the poor victim fell. You cry, "Shame! shame!" at such meanness. But the King, in this case, is our brother, and he will see that we have fair play. He will forbid the rushing out of more lions than we can meet; he will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able. Thank God! The King is in the gallery! His eyes are on us. His heart is with us. His hand will deliver us. "Blessed are all they who put their trust in him!"

I look again, and I see the angelic gallery. There they are: the angel that swung the sword at the gate of Eden, the same that Ezekiel saw upholding the throne of God, and from which I look away, for the splendor is insufferable. Here are the guardian angels. That one watched a patriarch; this one protected a child. That one has been pulling a soul out of temptation! All these are messengers of light! Those drove the Spanish Armada on the rocks. This turned Sennacherib's living hosts into a heap of one hundred and eighty-five thousand corpses. Those, yonder, chanted the Christmas carol over Bethlehem, until the chant awoke the shepherds. These, at creation, stood in the balcony of heaven, and serenaded the new-born world wrapped in swaddling clothes of light. And there, holier and mightier than all, is Michael, the archangel. To command an earthly host gives dignity; but this one is leader of the twenty thousand chariots of God, and of the ten thousand times ten thousand angels. I think God gives command to the archangel, and the archangel to the seraphim, and the seraphim to the cherubim, until all the lower orders of heaven hear the command, and go forth on the high behest.

Now, bring on your lions! Who can fear? All the spectators in the angelic gallery are our friends. "He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under foot."

Though the arena be crowded with temptations, we shall, with the angelic help, strike them down in the name of our God, and leap on their fallen carcasses! th, bending throng of bright, angelic faces hd swift wings, and lightning foot! I ail you, to-day, from the dust and strug of the arena!

I look again, and I see the gallery the prophets and apostles. Who are se mighty ones up yonder? Hosea, and er- emiah, and Daniel, and Isaiah, and ul. and Peter, and John, and James. re sits Noah, waiting for all the world to me into the ark; and Moses, waiting ti he last Red Sea shall divide; and Jere ah, waiting for the Jews to return; and n, of the Apocalypse, waiting for the s ar- ing of the angel that Time shall be no ger. Glorious spirits! Ye were howl at; ye were stoned; ye were spit upon! ey have been in the fight themselves nd they are all with us. Daniel knov all about lions. Paul fought with bea at Ephesus.

In the ancient amphitheatre, the ple got so excited that they would shou om the galleries to the men in the arena "At it again!" "Forward!" "One ore stroke!" "Look out!" "Fall b ! "Huzza! huzza!" So in that galler ro- phetic and apostolic, they cannot kee ei- peace. Daniel cries out: "Thy Go ill deliver thee from the mouth of the li s!" David exclaims: "He will not suff thy foot to be moved!" Isaiah calls out: "ear not! I am with thee! Be not disma d!" Paul exclaims: "Victory through ou ord Jesus Christ!" That throng of pr ets and apostles cannot keep still. They ake the welkin ring with shouting and lle- lujahs.

I look again, and I see the gallery the martyrs. Who is that? Hugh L ner, sure enough! He would not apolog for the truth preached; and so he die the night before swinging from the bed- perfect glee at the thought of emanci on. Who are that army of six thousa six hundred and sixty-six? They are th he- ban Legion who died for the faith. ere is a larger host in magnificent array- gio hundred and eighty-four thousand n perished for Christ in the persecut sur Diocletian. Yonder is a family gro Fe- licitas, of Rome, and her children. hey they were dying for the faith she st len- couraging them. One son was w ped to death by thorns; another was ing from a rock; another was beheade At last the mother became a martyr. here they are, together—a family group in eav- en! Yonder is John Bradford, wh said, in the fire, "We shall have a merry pper with the Lord to-night!" Yonder len- ry Voes, who exclaimed, as he die "If I had ten heads, they should all fall for Christ!" The great throng of th mar- tyrs! They had hot lead poure down their throats; horses were fastened their hands, and other horses to their fe and thus they were pulled apart; th had their tongues pulled out by red-hot ers; they were sewn up in the skins of a nals, and then thrown to the dogs; the were daubed with combustibles and set fire! If all the martyrs' stakes that ha been kindled could be set at proper dis nces, they would make the midnight, the world over, bright as noonday! A now they sit yonder in the martyrs' lery. For them the fires of persecution ha gone out. The swords are sheathed a the mob hushed. Now they watch us with all-observing sympathy. They k w the pain, all the hardship, all the a uish, all the injustice, all the privation. They cannot keep still. They cry: "C rage! The fire will not consume. The flo can- not drown. The lions cannot our! Courage! down there in the arena!

What, are they all looking? Th night we answer back the salutation th give, and cry, "Hail! sons and daughter of the fire!"

I look again, and I see another llery, that of eminent Christians. What rikes me strangely is the mixing in com nion- ship of those who on earth could n agree. There I see Martin Luther, and bes him a Roman Catholic who looked bey d the superstitions of his church and is saved. The is Albert Barnes, and around him the presbytery who tried him for heterodoxy! Yonder is Lyman Beecher, and the church court that denounced him! Stranger than all there is John Calvin and Jacobus Arminius! Who would have thought that they would sit so lovingly together. There is George Whitefield, and the Bishops who would not let him come into their pulpits because they thought him a fanatic. There are the sweet singers, Toplady, Montgomery, Charles Wesley, Isaac Watts, and Mrs. Sigourney. If heaven had had no music before they went up, they would have started the singing. And there, the band of missionaries: David Abeel, talking of China redeemed; and John Scudder, of India saved; and David Brainerd, of the aborigines evangelized; and Mrs. Adoniram Judson, whose prayers for Burmah took heaven by violence! All these Christians are looking into the arena. Our struggle is nothing to theirs. Do we, in Christ's cause, suffer from the cold? They walked Greenland's icy mountains. Do we suffer from the heat? They sweltered in the tropics. Do we get fatigued? They rested, with none to care for them but cannibals. Are we persecuted? They were anathematized. And as they look from their gallery and see us falter in the presence of the lions, I seem to hear Isaac Watts addressing us in his old hymn, only a little changed:

Must you be carried to the skies
On flowery beds of ease,
While others fought to win the prize,
And sailed through bloody seas?

Toplady shouts in his old hymn:

Your harps, ye trembling saints,
Down from the willows take;
Loud to the praise of love divine,
Bid every string awake.

While Charles Wesley, the Methodist, breaks forth in his favorite words, a little changed:

A charge to keep you have,
A God to glorify;
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky!

Look again, and I see the gallery of our departed. Many of those in the other galleries we have heard of; but these we know. Oh! how familiar their faces! They sat at our tables, and we walked to the house of God in company. Have they forgotten us? Those fathers and mothers stood us on the road of life. Are they careless as to what becomes of us? And the children: do they look on with stolid indifference as to whether we win or lose this battle for eternity? Nay; I see the child running his hand over your brow and saying, "Father, do not fret;" "Father, do not worry." They remember the day they left us. They remember the agony of the last farewell. Though years in heaven, they know our faces. They remember our sorrows. They speak our names. They watch this fight for heaven. Now; I see them rise up and lean over, and wave before us their recognition and encouragement. That gallery is not full. They are keeping places for us. After we have slain the lion, they expect the King to call us, saying, "Come up higher!" Between the hot struggles in the arena I wipe the sweat from my brow, and stand on tiptoe, reaching up my right hand to clasp theirs in rapturous hand-shaking, while their voices come ringing down from the gallery, crying, "Be thou faithful unto death, and you shall have a crown!"

But here I pause, overwhelmed with the majesty and the joy of the scene! Gallery of the King! Gallery of angels! Gallery of prophets and apostles! Gallery of martyrs! Gallery of saints! Gallery of friends and kindred! Oh majestic circles of light and love! Throngs! Throngs! Throngs! How shall we stand the gaze of the universe? Myriads of eyes beaming on us! Myriads of hearts beating in sympathy for us! How shall we ever dare to sin again? How shall we ever become discouraged again? How shall we ever feel lonely again? With God for us, and angels for us, and prophets and apostles for us, and the great souls of the ages for us, and our glorified kindred for us,—shall we give up the fight and die? No! Son of God, who didst die to save us. No! ye angels, whose wings are spread forth to shelter us. No! ye prophets and apostles, whose warnings startle us. No! ye loved ones, whose arms are outstretched to receive us. No! we will never surrender!

Sure I must fight if I would reign—
Be faithful to my Lord;
And bear the Cross, endure the pain,
Supported by Thy Word.

Thy saints in all this glorious war
Shall conquer, though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
And seize it with their eye.

When that illustrious day shall rise,
And all thine armies shine
In robes of victory through the skies,
The glory shall be thine.

My hearers! shall we die in the arena or rise to join our friends in the gallery? Through Christ we may come off more than conquerors. A soldier, dying in the hospital, rose up in bed the last moment and cried, "Here! Here!" His attendants put him back on his pillow, and asked him why he shouted "Here!" "Oh! I heard the roll-call of heaven, and I was only answering to my name!" I wonder whether, after this battle of life is over, our names will be called in the muster-roll of the pardoned and glorified, and with the joy of heaven breaking upon our souls, we shall cry, "Here! Here!"

A TESTIMONY TO MISSIONS.

There are some who, even in these days of Christian progress, still assert that missionary work does not accomplish all that is claimed for it. One of the most notable addresses made at the recent Episcopal convention in Minneapolis was Hon. John W. Foster's stanch defense of foreign missions, as seen by him in his travels in the East, and his hearty tribute to their success. He testified that Christianity is making itself felt in Syria, India and Japan, and declared his conviction that the Chinese can be converted and that vast multitudes will be, in the not distant future.

Regarding the recent riots, he said: "After careful inquiry and observation, my opinion is that the mass of the population in China, particularly the nobility, are not specially hostile to the missionaries or their work. The literati and prospective officials, the mandarins, seem to be the ones who have made the trouble. The war with Japan has weakened the imperial authority and the disappointed men in great numbers, sent back mostly without receiving pay, have added much to the prevailing disorder. We should remember in America to be chary of our condemnation in view of the treatment of Chinese on our part, which our Supreme Court has pronounced to be altogether contrary to treaty but without remedy."

Preaching Christ in Many Lands.

ing the wounds he has received, to a group of lazy, self-indulgent prelates who, surrounded by luxuries, pay him scant attention and regard him almost as a fanatic. There were men and women present at the meeting who in China, in Africa, or in the Islands of the Pacific had often been in imminent danger of death, who had braved peril from climate, from wild beasts and scarcely less savage men, that they might carry the news of salvation to the benighted heathen. That such men and women should be in any anxiety about the small amount they required for their support was truly pitiful. They are the servants of the Church, the messengers who go forth at its bidding to fulfil the behest of its Lord. Through them the Church obeys the command of Christ, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." To all such the Church should give with liberal hand and provide them with all the means necessary for carrying on their work. The Church was slow in beginning it; millions died without Christ who might have heard the good news had she been true to her mission; but now that the work is organized, that the first fruits are gathered in, and the fields are "white to harvest" there should be no grudging in the provision of the means.

There is enough in the history of the American Board, as there is in the history of the Boards of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Protestant Episcopal and other churches, to inspire gratitude and liberality. God has wonderfully blessed the efforts each has made for the advancement of the kingdom of his Son. The Missionary Societies, feeble and timid at the beginning, have grown strong and vigorous, and need only the loyal support of the churches to advance more than they have done in the past. Nearly nineteen centuries have passed since Christ's command was given, and yet only within the last two centuries have any really earnest efforts been made by the Protestant churches to obey it. The American Board, which is the oldest Missionary Society organized on this Continent, commenced its work only eighty-five years ago. It originated in the minds of a few inconspicuous persons. One autumn day in the year 1809, three young men walked out from Andover Seminary to a lonely glen in the neighborhood, to plead with God for the conversion of the heathen world. Their names were Samuel Mills, Gordon Hall, and James Richmond. They continued their petitions and spoke of their concern to their friends. To the prayer-meetings in the lonely glen came four other young men whose hearts God had touched. These were Judson, Newell, Hall and Nott. All seven finally offered themselves as foreign missionaries, and the American Board, representing several denominations, was organized to send them out.

THE CONGREGATIONAL HOUSE, BOSTON, HEADQUARTERS OF THE A. B. C. F. M.

The Board was appointed in September, 1810, by a meeting of New England ministers called for the purpose. It consisted of nine members, of whom five were ministers and four laymen. The ministers were John Treadwell, Joseph Lyman, Samuel Spring, Calvin Chapin and Samuel Worcester. The four laymen were some "young gentlemen members of the Divinity College who were impressed with the duty of personally attempting a mission to the heathen." Their names were Adoniram Judson, Samuel Nott, Samuel J. Mills and Samuel Newell. Their first meeting was held in the little parsonage at Farmington, Mass., and there, after prayerful consecration, they signed the roll and the American Board was organized. They took the name of "American" in the hope that it might really be regarded as a national institution, not limited to any section or any communion, and they defined their object as "the propagation of the Gospel among those who are destitute of the knowledge of Christianity." For some time the hope that there could be united action in the common cause was realized. Twenty years later, when the corporate members of the Board had increased to sixty-two, one-half the number were Presbyterians and the other half made up of Congregationalists and Reformed Dutch ministers, and the seventy-nine missionaries then working under the auspices of the Board in foreign lands were classified in the same proportions. In 1831, however, the Presbyterians decided to form a Board of their own, and the American Board gradually became a Congregational institution, as it remains.

(President of the A. B. C. F. M.)

On this page is a picture of the Congregational House in Boston, which has for more than twenty years been the headquarters of the Board. It has also two district agencies—one in the Bible House, New York, of which Dr. Charles C. Creegan is the head, and the other in Chicago, managed by Dr. A. W. Hitchcock. Dr. R. S. Storrs, the President of the Board, whose portrait appears on this page, is the well-known pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn. His urbanity, tact, and courtesy have never served a more useful purpose than in his Presidency of the Board, and it was with hearty goodwill that he was re-elected this year. Among the eminent missionaries of the Board, Dr. Cyrus Hamlin has a conspicuous place. He is the founder of the famous Roberts College at Constantinople, which has exercised a mighty influence for Christianity throughout the Orient. On the first page is a group of nine missionaries, several of whom now home on furlough, took part in the recent annual meeting. Dr. William A. Farnsworth's field is the historic town of Cæsarea; Dr. J. B. De Forest and Dr. John C. Berry have been laboring in Japan; Dr. S. W. Howland is the head of the Jaffna College in Ceylon; Dr. Chauncey Goodrich has been for more than thirty years one of the most active missionaries in Northern China; Dr. F. W. Bates comes from Gazaland, in Africa; Dr. Caleb C. Baldwin's station is at Foo-Chow, near the scene of the recent massacres. Mrs. Mary A. Logan, widow of Dr. Robert W. Logan, is still at the head of the work in Ruk, in Micronesia, to which her famous husband gave his life. Miss Lizzie S. Webb is at Adana, near Tarsus, and has had some perilous experiences of Mohammedan fanaticism under the rule of the Turkish Sultan.

SAUL CHOSEN KING.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 10. I. Sam. 10 : 17-27. Golden Text Ps. 97 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

QUIETLY and peacefully the children of Israel lived and served their God all the days of Samuel until he became an old man. The people were accustomed to his holy and faithful judgment, and it was easy for them in such circumstances to serve the Lord. But how should it be known and proved that this obedience was from the heart if they were not put to the proof? It is only the fire which proves each man's work of what sort it is (1. Cor. 3: 13). The powers of the old man began to fail, and he let many of his judicial duties fall into the hands of his sons. And finally he made them judges over Israel. But these young men had not been prepared for the office as Samuel their father had, and trouble began. Samuel's sons "walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment" (1. Sam. 8 : 1-3).

And the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and went to Samuel unto Ramah, not to bring the matter before the Lord; they had already made their plan; but to require of Samuel that he should make them a king to judge them like all the nations.

What a Moment for Samuel!

Was then the glorious work of reformation in Israel in which he had been made the instrument, to end thus? Had he spent all his days in maintaining the integrity of God's dominion over his people, and in jealously guarding them for God as a separate people, and now the work of a lifetime is to be overthrown? Had he not been their best friend, and now in his old age, when his strength failed him, would the people whom he had loved reject him? There was undoubtedly a mixture of self in his jealousy for God, when Samuel was displeased that the people asked for a king. But Samuel did not cease to be the hearing one; he carried the matter to his God, as was his wont. It was true that the people had failed, lamentably failed, but Samuel did not, therefore, attempt to put them right by his own power and influence; Samuel prayed unto the Lord.

It must have been an unexpected blow to Samuel when his God replied: "Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee: for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me that I should not be King over them; hearken to their voice; they do as they always have done; let them have their own way, but let them take it with their eyes open; show them the manner of the King that shall reign over them." Instead of gratitude for the blessed time of Samuel's government under the immediate direction of God as their recognized King, the unfaithful people as soon as they are put to the proof, act as though God had wronged them, and fall back on their own resources. It is the old story of living for self; they were impatient at the yoke which bound them to be a separate people, dependent on God for everything; they did not want to be treated as children; their national pride began to work; they did not want to be behind other nations, and were unwilling to be peculiar. Alas! it is always thus when self is the centre of our life! How few even realize that God's purpose is to make his people a people through whom he can manifest himself! The natural man seeks to manifest himself.

Samuel, at God's command, told the people how exacting the new king would be, and what claims he would make upon the sons and daughters of Israel to serve his purposes. But the people refused to listen to anything which crossed their own will: "Nay, but we will have a king over us, that we may be like all the nations; and that our king may judge us, and go out before us and fight our battles." Some of these very men had been present as children when their God had so wonderfully fought for them from heaven against the Philistines, but the human heart seeks glory for itself, and God's victories bring glory to him alone. So God let the people have their way. Thus only could they learn their lesson, and find out by bitter experience, that God would do better for them than they could do for themselves.

And God chose a king, not after his heart, but after their hearts. He had given them a judge after his heart, whom they had rejected in rejecting him: now they should have a king like themselves whom they could appreciate. He had to call Saul from the care of his fathers' asses which had gone astray, to the high vocation which lay before him. David also was called from the sheep-fold, but he went through a severe discipline before God put the rains of government into his hand. But God gave the people their desire a king like the nations and like themselves, not one who had been trained in the school of God. It is for one who has been much blest of God to others, when, in obedience to his God, he must do what in itself is hurtful, and a backward step; it takes a real understanding of God to go forward in such a service. But Samuel had learned that God, who sees the end from the beginning, always knows best, and that he is ever to be trusted. Thus he, the spiritual leader of the people, at the command of God, called, taught, feasted, and anointed the unspiritual Saul, to be king over Israel, and showed none of the sadness which was in his heart to him, but cheerfully did the will of God regarding him.

Samuel gave Saul the most minute directions about all the outward circumstances which he should meet with after he had anointed him in secret, and very specially he told him that when he should come to the city (Gibeah), he should meet with a company of prophets, and the Spirit of the Lord should come mightily upon him, and he should be turned into another man (chap. 10:6). Oh, if Saul had taken to heart the grace of God, and fully met him at this time, how different his reign and his end might have been! "God gave him another heart" (ver. 9). There must have been a great drawing nigh of God, Saul in the power of the Spirit prophesied among the prophets, causing amazement among all that heard him, and yet the time came when God departed from him and rejected him! It is an awful thing to trifle with a revelation of God. It is of his unmerited grace that he draws nigh to sinful man, by the Holy Ghost, and man has it in his power to yield to the Holy Spirit or to grieve him. God did not leave Saul to occupy his responsible position without letting his Holy Spirit come upon him so that he should experience what it is to speak and act by the Spirit. Alas! Saul failed his God, his country, and his own soul!

After Samuel had privately anointed Saul, and subsequently to the time when the Spirit of God had come upon him as we have seen, Samuel called the people together to the Lord to Mizpah, that the king whom they had desired might be publicly proclaimed and acknowledged by the people. Samuel addressed the assembled people, and gave them the direct message from their God, on this solemn occasion of governmental crisis in their land: he had made out his part in the matter with God; he was now God's interpreter and messenger to Israel as fully and as freely as though he himself had never been the visible governor among them. No hurt pride or wounded spirit hindered him from fully delivering the Lord's message. We cannot be the Lord's messengers when we mix up anything that is personal in the matter.

"Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel, I brought up Israel out of Egypt, and I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all the kingdoms which had oppressed you, but ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saveth you out of all your calamities and your distresses; and ye have said unto him: Nay, but set a king over us. Now, therefore, present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes and by your thousands." It is strange that such an appeal did not bring the assembled people on their faces in deepest repentance before the Lord, with the earnest petition that things might remain as they had been, and they might withdraw their request.

MEETING PLACE OF SAMUEL AND SAUL.

THE system of government up to the date of this lesson, which was probably about 1095 B. C., had been of the most uncertain kind. No one knew who would succeed the national leader when he might die. Indeed, at this time, it is probable that there were other judges than Samuel in the distant tribes. A patriot, who yet left out of his view the idea of God as the leader and ruler of the nation, would naturally take a gloomy view of the future. He would see that Israel was surrounded by enemies on all sides and that it would be possible for those enemies, by a combination, to destroy his people. With no one at the head of the whole nation, having the right and power to call out a national army, the enemy might annihilate one tribe after another, before resistance could be organized. If mutual jealousies arose, one tribe might be averse to going to the assistance of another tribe when it was attacked, and thus the nation might perish piecemeal. Doubtless some such apprehension was in the minds of the elders when they paid their visit to Samuel at Ramah. It is easy to see that the prophet, then over seventy years old, was shocked by what they said. The man of God had a clearer view of the real strength of the nation than the elders, and when they expressed a wish to have a king, so as to be like other nations, he saw that they were taking a suicidal course. The very basis of their national existence lay in their being unlike other nations, and in spite of all that they did then and at other times, unlike they have remained to this day. The nations can absorb and assimilate other races, but not the Jews; the Jew still remains apart and distinct in every land. But the perpetuation of the theocracy required faith in God, and these elders had not the faith. They could not be sure that God could or would keep the nation from breaking to pieces. Samuel carried his trouble to God, as was his wont, and in a short time announced that God was willing that the people should have their way. He does not force anyone. That is contrary to the principles of his government. He treats men as reasonable beings, not as infants. He warns them that a certain cause is injurious, but if after warning they choose to proceed with it, he does not prevent them. In this instance, he even helped them to a suitable choice. Nominally, Saul was chosen by lot, but the Bible writer informs us that he had already been appointed and anointed. A tall, kingly man, a warrior, was the kind of man they wanted, and they had him. They were to find out by sad experience, that this was not the way to the end they desired. The way for them to perpetual existence was not by force nor material strength, but by spirituality. To this day the Jews without a king, without a land, with no cohesive organization, are a separate people—separate by their faith.

Nay, but set a king over us. The people did not give heed to warning. They would have their own way. There is a story of a nurse with a spoiled child, that illustrates this attitude. The child was struggling to catch a wasp that was buzzing around. His nurse tried to hold him back and caught his hand to prevent him touching the wasp. The child raised a loud cry and his mother, one of those lazy, selfish women who care for nothing but their own ease and comfort, scolded the nurse for resisting him. "Let him have what he wants," she said. "But, ma'am, it will sting." "I don't care what it is, let him have it: I cannot bear his screaming." The nurse released the child with the final warning, "Don't touch it Bobby; it will sting you." It was disregarded and in a minute there was a louder scream than before. The mother was angry. She said, "Why did you make Bobby scream? Let him have what he wants." The nurse answered, "He has got it ma'am; that is why he is screaming."

I brought up Israel out of Egypt and delivered you. Had the ordinary Israelite been asked who did this he might have answered that it was Moses who did it. But Moses was only the instrument of God. People are apt to forget that God rules and governs. It is recorded of Bulstrode Whitelocke, a statesman of the seventeenth century, that one night he was greatly distressed by the troubles of his country and so apprehensive of calamities apparently impending, that he could not sleep, but spent the night pacing the floor groaning and wringing his hands. His secretary, a pious man, entering the room asked him what was distressing him, and Whitelocke told him. "Don't you think that God governed the world very well before you were born?" the secretary asked. Whitelocke said, "Undoubtedly." The secretary continued: "Don't you think that he will, when you are dead God will be able to govern the world?" "Most assuredly," was the reply. "Then," said the secretary, "don't you think you might trust him to govern it while you live?" Whitelocke saw the force of the argument and having prayed a prayer, lay down and slept peacefully till the morning.

Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom. It was his duty to do so, but it availed nothing; the people believed their own plan was best. It is surprising how often the attempt to thwart God's purposes is made, and how often the attempt fails. Napoleon I. was anxious to found a dynasty, but he had no son to succeed him on the throne. Regardless of the law of Josephine, his wife, who had been his partner in obscurity, he divorced her and married an Austrian princess. The latter had a son, and he proclaimed the infant King of Rome. But the child never sat on the throne. It was Napoleon III., a descendant of the despised and divorced Josephine, who revived the empire and was the successor of Napoleon as Emperor of the French. The divorce was actually in the words Napoleon, himself, used, but another thing—a crime that led to naming.

God who himself saved you. The Lord had been the Saviour of the nation in the past there was no doubt; yet the people could not bring themselves to trust him for the future. They thought that the means by which other nations had become strong would make Israel strong and united. It needs faith to take the other course. An ordinary Christian, if he were called upon to provide for seven or eight hundred children, would send out appeals for charitable for help; would advertise; would organize committees to gather subscriptions—in short, would do as the Hebrews did at Ramah; would adopt the methods which succeeded elsewhere. George Muller does nothing of this kind. In every crisis he looks to God for deliverance, and never asks it of any man. Yet his huge family of orphans has never known want. They are fed, clothed, and educated now as they have been for years. The man who would serve God must trust him wholly, and not try to combine worldly methods with his.

A CABLEGRAM from Kertch, in the Crimea, Russia, brings the good news that Mr. William Willard Hvard, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Com-

msioner has reached that city, en route for V in Armenia. Mr. Howard is on schedul time, and in all probability, when this rehes the hands of our readers, he will hle arrived in Van and begun relief work inarnest. After organizing a Missionary Rief Committee, which will include Miss Kball, Mr. and Mrs. Raynolds, and sde six others, together with Mr. Hallwd, the British Vice-Consul, the work w be pushed into all the famine districts wn the view of relieving and giving emplment to as many families as possible bre the severe winter sets in. Thanks tohe splendid generosity of our friends erywhere, the work has had a most apicious beginning, and there is every pspect that hundreds of lives will be sed through the self-denying gifts sent tothe Relief Fund during the past few wks. We shall be advised by cable fm week to week, of its progress by Mr. Hvard, and will receive detailed reports bnail of the extent and character of the Cmmittee's operations.

he real work of the Relief Committee isiow about to begin. It is earnestly hed that enough funds will be placed at itlisposal to enable it to do effective servp. "In His Name,' in those districts were the suffering is the sharpest and were the exiled families, helpless and hheless, are looking and praying earnery for God's people in the West to come ttheir aid. Up to the present time there isno perceptible abatement in the sufferin which, as the venerable Dr. Hamlin aured us last week, was far too great to bxaggerated. From a recent letter recved from Diarbekir, Armenia, during tl week, we are permitted to make this eract:

There was a time when people from tneighboring towns used to come to this cin search of work, and not a few of tlm established their homes here. But nv, natives of our city, for want of work a means of support, are obliged to emigte. Famine, incendiary fires, and contnal oppressions, have reduced the inhitants of this city, and the farmers of t neighboring villages to absolute beggy. Moreover, to the needy and distsed people of this city are now added mny refugees from Sassoun, hundreds ourvivors of the massacres, who have n homes and no means of support. Hngry and almost naked they roam in t streets from morning until evening, bging a piece of bread from those who a already almost equally in need of help. hw hard to describe the pitiable conditn of these unfortunate and homeless ple and their suffering! We cannot dep their misery. Only those who see wh their eyes can realize the depths of sh distress. Most of them hungry and rxed spend the night in the church-yards, hving no covering to protect them from the cold. In order to complete their misery, cholera has begun its ravages here, and it can be easily understood that these people, already exhausted from want and exposure, will not be able to resist the ravages of the plague. Thus hundreds may be expected to fall victims to starvation and cholera."

Important letters have been placed in the possession of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, some of them from leaders of the Armenian Church, which more than sustain the reports of the widespread suffering already published. These are now in the hands of our translators. Foremost among the noble Armenians who have been active in the relief movement is Mugerditch Khrimian, the Catholicos of Etchmiadzin, in the Caucasus, who is the religious head of the Armenian Church. He is regarded as the grandest and broadest man of his nation, and he is beloved and honored by the Armenians everywhere. His portrait appears on this page. The Armenian Church is the oldest of all Christian national churches. According to a native legend, Jesus corresponded with King Abgarus of Edessa or Ur, and the Apostles Thaddæus and Bartholomew preached the Gospel to them. The historical founder of the Armenian Church was St. Gregory, "The Illuminator," an Arsarcid prince, who was consecrated Bishop of Armenia at Cæsarea, in 302 A.D. That the Armenians cherish a passionate attachment to their Church and their religion is shown by the long roll of martyrs to the Christian cause—a roll to which thousands have been lately added through Moslem hate and cruelty.

MUGERDITCH KHRIMIAN, ARMENIAN CATHOLICOS AT ETCHMIADZIN.

Among the many letters received from contributors to the Fund are the following, from which we quote briefly:

M. Etzendams, Polo., Ill. ($10), writes:

God hasten the time when a Christian government shall take the place of that rotten monarchy.

M. J. S. O., Topsfield, Me. ($1), writes:

I send a little with a prayer that it may be the means of saving some poor soul from starvation.

"A Light-keeper," in Boston Harbor, sends $1 to the Fund and points to the injunction of I. John 3: 17.

Friends in the Congregational Church, Richmond, Me., write:

I brought the matter of the starving Armenians before my people, and asked for private contributions, and the enclosed ($9.10) is the result to the Fund to help the Armenians. I hope and pray that the hunger of the people there may be met with Christian sympathy in a practical way.

Rev. A. Humphreys, Ingleside, Steuben county, N. Y., writes:

When I read the account of suffering, oppression, and famine which the poor Armenians are undergoing, I said to myself, "something must be done." I am preaching for a poor church. The members are nearly all farmers who have no crops to sell this fall except potatoes. However, I determined to take a collection for the sufferers; I did so and enclose the same ($2.27). The small gift of Ingleside Christian Church will not be despised for it goes accompanied by our prayers for the speedy relief of our Christian brethren across the sea.

Rose Snyder, Capron, N. Y. ($5), writes:

The love of Christ constraineth me to send a small portion, to relieve the suffering Christians in Armenia; and I pray God will speed and direct it that it may only reach and allay some of the sufferings of his people.

Mrs. C. M. Hatheway, W. Worthington, Mass. ($2), writes:

The ladies of our Church Aid Society would like to do something for the Armenian Christians. Our contribution is small but we have our earnest prayers that it may do much good.

A King's Daughter, Me., sends this:

Let me feel that I am keeping hunger from one mother and two little ones for a time in the suffering district of Armenia. You state that $5 will accomplish this.

W. E. P., East Pepperell, writes:

I will send you $5 for the Armenian Relief Fund. I have harvested most of my crops, and God has blessed me abundantly. I have enough to keep me through winter and to spare. I cannot turn away from the cry of the needy.

A Reader at Millbrook, N. J., sends $1, "the mites of two friends of the poor Armenians, to be cast into the treasury for them."

S. H., Washington, D. C., says:

Inclosed please find $2 (two dollars) for the Armenian sufferers. May it indeed be blessed in helping some poor soul in distress, for the sake of him that had not where to lay his head.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Glazier, Salem, Mass., send this:

Enclosed we hand you ten dollars for the Armenian Relief Fund. Although there are many uses for the Lord's tenth, we feel the present need of our Armenian neighbors is urgent. May the Lord bless your efforts.

M. J. M., Baltimore, Md. ($1), writes:

I feel it a privilege, and am sorry I have not more to send. May many who have plenty be touched with the Saviour's spirit, and give largely.

But we cannot devote more space to these letters, everyone of which breathes the pure spirit of Christ-like sympathy with suffering. They are full of earnest prayers for the welfare, spiritual and physical, of the thousands of men, women, and tender children who are now bereft of home and shelter, and especially of the widows and the fatherless. Every gift in such a cause brings a blessing to both giver and receiver. All contributions will be acknowledged in these columns.

ANCIENT MONASTERY OF AGH-TAMAR, ARMENIA

As we go to press, intelligence reaches us of a telegram sent from Kars to Lord Salisburg by the Armenian Metropolitan of Erzeroum, where riots have recently occurred. The Archbishop writes:

Permit me to re-echo the cry of distress raised throughout the length and breadth of my diocese by the Armenian population, who are goaded to despair by the savagery and growing hostility of the Turkish government.

Truly we note with profound gratitude the loyal and humane efforts put forth by the Government of her Majesty the Queen for the purpose of securing reforms for Armenia; but we cannot forget that every day's delay costs the lives of hundreds of human beings who are put to death, and the honor and purity of thousands of women who are violated, to say nothing of the pillage and devastation of numerous villages which are set on fire and reduced to rack and ruin.

Do, we implore you, take pity upon us! It is not too late. Succor, save us, or we perish.

The Armenian Metropolitan of Erzeroum.
(Signed), GHEVOND SHISMANIAN.

From another source comes this touching picture of the present misery in the Armenian provinces:

The letters we receive from Erzeroum, Van and Bitlis draw the saddest picture of the misery which oppresses the wretched inhabitants of these vilayets. The people wander about naked, hungry, without a shelter, in devastated fields, scratching the earth with their nails to try to find something with which to satiate the hunger which gnaws at their entrails. The Kurds proclaim from the top of the minarets that they defy all the commissions of inquiry, past, present or future; that they don't want reforms; that they recognize no other authority than that of Allah and their sword; that, as independent warriors, they will know how to defend their right to pillage, rapine, murder and conflagration.

MISS JANE.

AS I write the name, she comes back to me, over the many years which lie between us, my dear, gentle, altogether charming friend, and the teacher of my early girlhood, Miss Jane. Here and there, the land over, and perhaps among my readers, there are women with gray hair, but young at heart still, who were once little girls, sitting with slates and books in the school, which was kept by three youthful sisters, Miss Anna, Miss Elizabeth, Miss Jane. We did not then know how young they were, for children have no standard by which to measure those older than themselves, and are very apt to fancy parents and teachers quite venerable, when the latter are simply in the youth of middle age.

That old-fashioned schoolhouse, white, with green blinds, stood on the bank of a river, with green fields all about, and a bridge in plain sight, over which foot passengers and wagons went intermittently through the day, while a belt of firs in the distance was like a darkly verdant wall. Our desks were ranged along the windows, and Miss Jane's was at one end of the room. She taught the smallest pupils, but gave lessons in penmanship and French to the older girls. I make my fs and my ps to-day, as she taught me to do, and I never pick up my French Bible, nor read a French periodical or book, without remembering my lessons beside her chair.

But I am not talking of Miss Jane, because I loved her, and still love her, and look forward to meeting her by-and-by in the heaven where she has dwelt these long years, rather because among my CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, there are some to whom my picture of her may be suggestive and useful. Some of you teach, and in your position hold a position of influence which angels might envy, so easily can you influence the minds of children, and so indelible are the impressions you make.

Once, confronted by a puzzling situation, and tempted to sin against my conscience, I wrote "Dear Miss Jane" a wee bit of a note, folding it in the shape of a cocked hat, and slipping it, as I entered school in the morning, into a small drawer in the side of her desk, a sacred repository to us girls, for was it not our post-office? At recess a small messenger brought me Miss Jane's answer a very brief reply, in her clear and beautifully legible hand, and this was the whole of it: "Dear M.—Don't you think this is safe, 'Whether ye eat or drink,or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God?'"

You see, how judicious and discreet was this leaving the decision to the higher test, the only test which, after all, it is worth our while to trust when we must settle upon one of two conflicting courses. Miss Jane always spoke of heaven as the highest court of appeals, from which no one could possibly differ, once having received the verdict.

As I recall her, she was dressed with the utmost daintiness, her dark hair parted and worn in smooth and shining bandeaux over her ears, for neither fluffy fringes, nor crimps, nor any of our latter day fussiness had obtained vogue in Miss Jane's girlhood. Her slender, white hands wore no rings, her collar was fastened by a gold brooch, and her white linen cuffs with gold buttons. Everything about her was spotless, pure, exquisite, and we all felt called upon to imitate her, and be neat and delicately clean, and perfectly tidy ourselves. One year, red calicoes and cambrics with white aprons, finished by frills, were the fashion, and we must have looked like a field of poppies and daisies and red clovers in the sunshine, with our light hearts and happy faces.

I knew a teacher once whose work lay in the slums, and whose class was composed of street boys of the kind found in the foreign tenement-house neighborhoods. This teacher, like my Miss Jane, was a woman of great charm and beauty, and one heightened her beauty by dressing with great care, not richly, but with the most minute attention to every small detail. One morning she came to the breakfast table looking radiant, her black gown brightened by an extremely elegant bow of ribbon at the neck, and a buckle of silver fastening her belt. She had a silver comb in her hair, and announced that on her way to school she intended to buy a Jacqueminot rose to stick into her bonnet.

"Why all these elaborate preparations," said somebody: "are you expecting a visit from some princess, or from your school committee; why are you gotten up with so much attention to effect, as if you were going to a party?"

"The fact is," said the lady, smiling, "my boys have been rather troublesome of late, and some of them have been playing truant. I must make them in love with my looks, and I have noticed that it pays to wear a pretty gown to school among these little fellows; they see so much that is not pretty and attractive in their homes."

Human nature is so much alike, no matter what the condition, that it is safe to apply Miss Jane's rule in every case, both to the higher and the lower classes. Use the adjectives for convenience merely. In our heavenly Father's sight, our poor distinctions of "higher" and "lower" do not stand for much. Under the velvet gown and under the homespun frock, hearts are much the same, and are reached by the same means.

Miss Jane exercised over her girls always a pronounced religious, perhaps I would better say, a pronounced unworldly influence. Not only unworldly, but unworldly she was in her ways and looks, and we felt that anything mean, small, petty, underhanded, was unworthy and that we could not claim her friendship unless we lived up to high standards. To be with her, was to breathe a pure mesphere. Her life was keyed to the heavenly harmonies.

After awhile we had a great trial. Miss Jane, our dear Miss Jane was married. We could not readily forgive the man who had dared to court her, and carry her off to another town and state. But, in time, we were reconciled, and as we grew up and married in our turns, we sympathized in her gladness, and knew that the best of life's joy, its crown and consummation, came to Miss Jane when she stood at the altar, and in the most sacred hour that ever dawns for woman, became a good man's bride.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"LET DOWN YOUR NETS!"

LAUNCH out into the deep,
The awful depths of a world's despair,
Hearts that are breaking and eyes that weep,
Sorrow and ruin and death are there.
And the sea is wide and the pitiless tide
Bears on its bosom—away,
Beauty and youth in relentless ruth
To its dark abyss for aye—for aye.
But the Master's voice comes over the sea,
"Let down your nets for a draught" to me.

He stands in our midst on our wreck strewn strand,
And sweet and royal is his command.
His pleading call
Is to each—to all;
And whenever the royal call is heard
There hang the nets of the royal word
Trust to the nets and not to your skill
Trust to the royal Master's will!
Let down your nets each day, each hour
For the word of a king is a word of power.
And the King's own voice comes over the sea
"Let down your nets for a draught" to me.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

REVOLUTION IN COREA.

THE little "Hermit Kingdom" which was the occasion of the war between China and Japan is in the throes of volution. Cable reports direct from Seoul, the capital, announce that on October 8, an attack was made on the Royal Palace, the Queen was murdered as were several of her attendants and the King was taken prisoner. The King's father, Tai Won Kun has been proclaimed dictator, and a new cabinet had been formed for the government of Corea. Only meagre details were received owing to the confusion prevailing in the Corean capital; but it would appear that the outbreak is due to an old family dispute and that Tai Won Kun was the leader of the conspiracy. The most serious element of the complication is that the Japanese in Corea are implicated in the disturbances, and are reported to have taken an active part in the attack on the palace and the murder of the Queen. It is known that the new government is pro-Japanese in its sympathies, but it is extremely improbable that Japan has fomented the revolution on that account. It is more likely that the ambitious usurper is won to his side by bribes, or promise of office, some of the needy Japanese, of whom there are many in Corea and that the and not the accredited representative of Japan in Corea, are the real foreign supporters of the new Government. More than two months ago the Japanese minister at Seoul appealed to his government to restrict the emigration of Japanese rowdies to Corea, and warned the Emperor that their conduct was disgracing the Japanese character and making Japan odious in the eyes of Coreans. The event in any case promises to be very embarrassing for Japan. Large numbers of its citizens are in business in Corea and Japan naturally hoped that having secured for Corea its independence of Chinese control, the country would recognize Japan as her best friend and turn to her for help and guidance in the development of the country. No, however, the King will remember, should he regain his throne, as he seems likely to do, that the outrage and murder were committed by Japanese and will be hostile to Japanese influence. It is possible too, that Russia, having reasons of her own for wishing Corea to remain a weak and undeveloped nation, may make the outrage a pretext for excluding Japan from the peninsula. Thus the criminal attempt to promote Japanese interests in Corea may prove the cause of ruin to them. It is not the first time that a good cause has been injured by its unprincipled friends. Even irreligious men have often had occasion to echo the condemnation pronounced by the apostle on those who say:

Let us do evil that good may come. (Rom. 3 : 8.)

THE LATE QUEEN OF COREA.

The Pavement Lifted.

Residents on Fifth avenue, New York, and persons walking or riding on the avenue about nine o'clock in the morning of Oct. 18, were startled by a loud explosion. Three of the huge flagstones, weighing several tons each, were hurled to the street into the air and shattered to pieces; the windows of several houses were broken and one or two had the doors burst in. Happily no one was walking over that part of the pavement at the time, but people were on the other side of the avenue and they were flung violently aside and several horses were frightened and ran away. In the house in front of which the explosion occurred a great deal of damage was done. Walls were rent, doors torn from their hinges, crockery and ornaments broken, furniture overturned. The people in the house thought that there must have been an explosion of dynamite, but an investigation showed that a much less dreaded agency had done the mischief. There had been a leak from the gas main under the pavement a few days before and the gas company had been notified of it, but had postponed making repairs. The leak went on day and night permeating the soil under the flagstones, until an electric spark from the light wire exploded it. The damage done to the houses and pavement is estimated at five thousand dollars. It would have been much more serious if it had occurred at a later hour of the day when the street is usually thronged, as some one would have surely been injured. We speak of such an event as an accident, but it does not deserve the name, as it was the natural result of negligence, which is the cause of so many untoward events. Sometimes they occur in life and character and then they are very disastrous. People are often surprised when some prominent and respected man commits some grievous crime, but they would not be so astonished if they knew for how long a time sin had been secretly permeating his nature, and bringing it into a condition in which a sudden temptation destroyed it in a moment.

He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy. Prov. 29 : 1.

GROUNDS AROUND THE ROYAL PALACE AT SEOUL, COREA.

A Ghastly Specimen.

An inquiry at the custom-house in New York recently about the dead body of an American gentleman who died in Capetown, in South Africa, elicited the fact that it had arrived by a certain steamer. It was found, however, that the steamer's papers contained no mention of the corpse. But they did contain an entry of a case purporting to be filled with "a first-class specimen of natural history." This case proved to be the one enclosing the casket in which the body of the deceased gentleman was sent to America. The clerks at the custom-house say that the bodies of many distinguished Americans have come home classified under that heading. In one instance the body of a bishop who died abroad was so identified on the ship's papers. "It would have been impossible a few years ago," the clerk said, "to get it here in any other way. The crews of vessels would not sail with it on board if they knew what it was. They were kept in ignorance of its being there by its being labeled as a specimen of natural history, though the captain and the purser generally knew or suspected what it contained. Of course, it might be called anything, but the officials liked to keep as near the truth as they could." That they were very near the truth in so describing it everyone must admit; yet people do not live as if they thought so. The great majority are always ready to sacrifice the interests of the soul, which is really the man, for the gratification of the body which at any time may become merely "a first-class specimen of natural history."

Therefore I say unto you, take no thought . . . for your body, etc. Matt. 6 : 25.

A Costly Breeze.

The records of one of the Detective Agencies in New York contain a remarkable entry in the "Lost and Found" department. It is the offer of a reward of five hundred dollars for the recovery of a man's hat. It appears that a man in a high social position living in a small town on the Hudson and doing business in New York city called at the Agency in a state of great excitement. He said that in stepping from one car to another on the train as he came to business that morning, a gust of wind had blown his silk hat from his head. He wanted that hat and wanted it at once. He would pay a reward of five hundred dollars for it. As the hat could not have cost more than eight or ten dollars some surprise was manifested at the amount of the reward, but the loser proved that he was sincere. A detective was despatched to make inquiries along the line and soon found the hat in the possession of a track-walker. He examined it closely and soon found why the loser had been so anxious to recover it. Between the lining and the outside of the hat a letter was concealed, which, if the contents had become known, would have caused a social scandal of great magnitude. So by the payment of the reward the sender and receiver of the letter escaped exposure for that time. It would be well if their narrow escape led them to amend their ways; but that is not the usual result. It more frequently leads to a continuance in evil courses, and an ignoring of the fact that ultimate exposure cannot be avoided and condign punishment is certain.

Because sentence on an evil work is not executed speedily the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil. Eccles. 8 : 11.

The Dreams of the Blind.

An interesting article on the dreams of the blind is published by a psychological journal. It is from the pen of the superintendent of a Home for the Blind in Pennsylvania. He says that he has made a practice of asking all blind persons with whom he has come in contact about their habits of thought, and especially about their dreams. He finds that no person who has been blind from birth ever dreams of seeing anything. "The impressions of their dreams are regulated by the impressions made and ideas obtained by the senses of touch, hearing, taste and smell." One of the most intelligent inmates of the Home under his charge, who was born blind, said that although he had listened to lectures describing mountain scenery, the aspects of the sea and wonderful spectacles, and although he enjoyed having books read to him in which there were descriptions of natural beauty, he has never dreamed of them, or of any object or person with whom he has not come into actual contact. He dreams of music, of the voices of persons he knows, but never of a landscape, a picture, or a tree. No idea of what they look like is formed in his mind or is imagined in his sleep. Even in the unrestrained fancy of the sleeper it seems there is no capacity for the use of the sense of which he has had no experience. It is so in the spiritual world. The natural man has no capacity for apprehending spiritual things. It is only when he is quickened by the Holy Spirit that he sees the things that were dark to him before.

THE CHINESE SAGE.

The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit . . . neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned 1 Cor. 2 : 14.

BRIEF NOTES.

All Letters to Dr. Talmage as Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be addressed to him at the Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

The Deputation sent by the American Board to visit Japan, consisting of Sec. J. L. Barton, D.D., Drs. A. H. Bradford and J. G. Johnson, and the Hon. W. P. Ellison, arrived at Yokohama on Oct. 2d.

Mr. D. L. Moody's Meetings at Kinsman, O., are still bearing fruit. From a report sent to us by a correspondent it would appear that of the five or six thousand persons who were gathered on the fair grounds for the services many have carried to their homes impressions that will not be effaced while they live.

At the Convention of the Christian Endeavor Society of New York State, held in Brooklyn recently, the Secretary reported a membership of 174,840, a gain over last year of 13,900. There are now 2,914 Societies in the State, a gain of 285 during the year. Of these 779 are connected with Presbyterian Churches, 699 with Baptist Churches, and 251 with Congregational churches. There are 970 Junior Societies, with a membership of 29,130.

The South American Evangelical Mission decided at its recent meeting in Toronto to send Dr. Bremner to the South early in the new year to establish a training institution in Buenos Ayres or Montevideo to prepare workers for Paraguay, Uruguay, Argentine and Bolivia. Many suitable Christian young men have volunteered to become missionaries. The headquarters of the Mission are at 4 Simpson Ave., Toronto.

A Remarkable Service was Held in the Drill hall of the First Regiment Armory, Philadelphia, on Oct. 6. Bands of Workers had, during the week, distributed tickets of admission at stores and factories, and they were eagerly accepted. Upwards of three thousand persons were present. Dr. L. W. Munhall was the preacher. He was heard with intense attention, and at the close more than a hundred persons rose to ask for prayers.

Mr. E. P. Telford's Friends in this Country will be glad to learn that he is meeting with great success in England. He has just concluded a united mission in the Public Hall, Wisbech. Baptists, Methodists, Congregationalists, as well as the Society of Friends, helped in the mission. The hall was filled night after night, and large numbers found in the inquiry rooms. Every church in town was represented amongst those who received blessing. Mr. Telford is now holding a mission in Bristol.

The Ninth Annual Convention of the Christian Workers' Association will be held at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 7-14. Efforts have been made to arrange for this being the most exhaustive convention yet held and the programme shows that they are likely to be successful. No less than sixty subjects are set down for consideration, each introduced by a speaker practically conversant with the kind of work he will undertake to describe. All inquiries should be sent to Rev. John C. Collins, New Haven, Conn.

The Thirteenth International Biennial Conference of the Women's and Young Women's Christian Associations, will open in Memorial Hall, Brooklyn, N. Y., on Thursday, November 7 and continue until Thursday, November 14, the sessions being held morning and afternoon. The object of the conference is to secure unity and give definiteness to the purpose and work of the association locally and as a general body. It is expected that fully one hundred delegates and many visitors will attend from all parts of the United States, and also from Canada.

Commenting on the Inquiry as to the Responsibility for the massacres at Kucheng, "The Missionary Herald" says: "Let it not be supposed that hostility to the Christian religion lies at the basis of the disturbances. Sometimes, doubtless, the religion of the foreigner is denounced, but it is not from antipathy to his religion more than it is to his clothes. A missionary of the Church in Scotland says of the Chinese: 'No people are so latitudinarian. You may have any religion or no religion, and you will offend none of their prejudices.' English merchants at Kucheng trading in [illegible] would have met with same fate as English missionaries."

CARD FROM DR. TALMAGE.

Because the editor of this paper moves to the National Capital, let no one think that he moves an inch away from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I shall be in this office every few days in person, and every day by immediate communication. The only difference will be that I will be nearer the headquarters of everything. Doors of important information will be easier opened to me than ever before. I hope to take wider views of things. Washington is the heart of the nation. All denominations of Christians are building, or propose to build, at the Capital institutions of learning and religion. What a man cannot know at Washington is not worth knowing at all.

We ask for the prayers of all our readers at the important step we are taking. From Brooklyn, our past residence, to Washington, our future residence, I hope, means reinforcement for larger and better work with pen and voice.

THE ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

TWO items of pleasing intelligence have reached us during the week. Mr. Howard, our Commissioner, has cabled us from Kertch on the Black Sea, whence he goes to Trebizond and thence on to Erzeroum. His journey has thus far been safely accomplished on schedule time. We may expect next to hear from him in Van, busily engaged in the relief work, in conjunction with the Missionary Committee. The other piece of news is that, according to late dispatches from Constantinople, Turkey has at last yielded to the demands of Great Britain, France and Russia for important administrative reforms in Armenia. Should the Porte adhere to this decision, happy and prosperous days may yet be in store for the unfortunate Armenians; but so deceitful and treacherous has been the Moslem policy toward the Christians, that it is exceedingly doubtful whether the proposed reforms will ever materialize into anything more substantial than diplomatic promises. Turkey's long record of hideous crimes against Christians—the innumerable instances of massacre, outrage, rapine, and persecution—all prove beyond question that the Ottoman power is untrustworthy and will only keep faith with Christian nations under the strongest compulsion.

There has come into the possession of the CHRISTIAN HERALD a number of official documents which, if published, would shed such a lurid and ghastly light on recent events in Armenia as would startle all Christendom. Long lists of the martyrs and of their murderers; of women outraged and compelled to accept Islam and enter Mohammedan harems, and lists of the brutal Moslems who upheld their faith by such foul deeds; lists of the Christian sanctuaries violated (some turned into mosques and others converted into stables), and the names of their desecrators. Lists by districts and by villages of the multitudinous extortions and the wholesale robberies by which the Turkish officials and their petty subordinates have ruined many a prosperous Armenian community, and after stripping it bare of everything, and slaying its defenders, driven the trembling survivors to the hills. These documents form such an indictment against the Turk as has never yet been framed in the Saxon tongue. But the present duty of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not to redress the wrongs of the Armenian people, but to relieve their sufferings. It may never be necessary to drag this shameful exhibit to the light, nor will it ever be done, save as a last resort, in the interest of justice and mercy.

WANDERING THOUGHTS.

NOTHING bothers the Christian more than the imperfection of his prayers. His getting down on his knees seems to be the signal for his thoughts to fly every whither. While praying about one thing he is thinking about another. Could you keep your mind ten minutes on one supplication? I never could. While you are praying, your store comes in, your kitchen comes, your losses and gains come in. The minister spreads his hands for prayer, and you put your head on the back of the pew in front, and travel round the world in five minutes. A brother rises in prayer-meeting to lead in supplication. After he has begun, the door slams, and you peep through your fingers to see who is coming in. You say to yourself, "What a finely expressed prayer," or "What a blundering specimen! But how long he keeps on! Wish he would stop! He prays for the world's conversion. I wonder how much he gives for it? There! I don't think I turned the gas down in the parlor. Wonder if Bridget has gone home yet? Wonder if they have thought to take the cake out of the oven?" or, "What a fool I was to put my name on the back of that note! Ought to have sold those goods for cash, and not on credit!" And so you go on, thinking over one thing after another until the gentleman says "Amen!" and you lift up your head saying, "There! I haven't prayed a bit. I am not a Christian." Yes you are, if you have resisted the tendency. Christ knows how much you have resisted, and how thoroughly we are diseased of sin, and he will pick out the one earnest petition from the rubbish and answer it. To the very depth of his nature, he sympathizes with the infirmities of our prayers.

CHILDREN IN A PICTURE.

IT is a stubborn sea of trouble that will not divide when four baby feet go paddling in it. We are glad that Raphael did not choose for his picture cherubs with wings fastened at the backbone, ready any moment to fly away with them, but children that look as if they had come to stay. Rather thinly dressed, indeed, for cool weather. Raphael's picture-children did not cost him much for clothes. You know it was a warm climate. Though a bachelor, Raphael knew the worth of children in a picture. With their little hands they open the inside door of the heart, and let us pass in, when otherwise we might have been kept standing on the cold steps, looking at the corbeils and caryatides of the outside architecture. It was a little maid that directed Naaman to the Jordan for healing, and it is a child in the picture that shows the leper of harsh criticism where to wash his scales off. It is by the introduction of children into their paintings that Canaletto gives warmth to the ice-[illegible] of Venice, and Gainsborough simplicity to the hollowness of a watering-place, and Turner pathos to the "Decline of Carthage," and Ruysdale life to a dead landscape; and Giotto and Tacconi and Orcagn and Joshua Reynolds follow in the track of a boy's foot. "And a little child shall lead them."

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Beginning next week, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be printed in colors. This new departure will be a very pleasing one to our readers. Episodes of Christian work and progress in our own day, thus pictured, will acquire a new and rare charm and a far greater value. There is no reason why secular papers should monopolize one of the most attractive phases of modern journalism. We believe that if there is any power for good in color printing, the Lord's cause should have the benefit of it.

Old Subscriber, Vermont. Can the Bible Premium be obtained by old subscribers when renewing their subscriptions, or by new subscribers only?

It can be obtained by both old and new subscribers.

Subscriber, Alburgh. As regards your premium offered ten books, does each one of these volumes consist of three hundred pages separately or the whole ten combined?

Each one separately contains three hundred pages or over, the whole ten containing an aggregate of three thousand pages.

Geo. H. Fountain, Plainfield, N. J. Who is the author of the poem beginning, "There is no death?"

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The verse to which you refer is a part of the poem entitled, "Resignation," and reads:

There is no death, what seems so is transition.
This life of mortal breath,
Is but a suburb of the life elysian
Whose portal we call death.

J. P., Central Falls, R. I. Please state in THE MAIL-BAG if I can have your premium of Library and Book Case as advertised in your paper, by renewal of my subscription any time, although it does not expire until 10th of April, 1897?

Yes; you can secure the Library Premium by renewing your subscription now; your subscription will then be marked up for one year from April 16, 1896.

Subscriber. Who was the author of the Apostles' Creed?

It was held by early writers that it was composed by the Apostles themselves, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, during their stay at Jerusalem, after our Lord's ascension. Rufinus, who wrote about A.D. 400, says they composed it "as a short rule of their preaching, each one contributing his sentence, and left it as a rule to be given to all believers."

R. McN., New Haven, Conn. Have the Calvinists and Arminians settled their differences? If not, why has the dispute which was vigorous some thirty or forty years ago, fallen quiet?

The differences were never settled. They are not disputed to so great an extent now as formerly, chiefly because the advocates on both sides have discovered that there was little hope of coming to an agreement. Also because more practical questions of a more radical character are now absorbing attention. The duty of preaching the Gospel to every creature, and of offering to every one free salvation through Christ, is recognized, and this is seen to be a more profitable occupation than that of discussing whether a man's eternal destiny was immutably fixed ages before he was born.

Lover of Jesus. Did all the Israelites march around Jericho or was it just the armed men and the priests with the ark of the covenant? The superintendent of our Sunday School says they all marched in the procession.

Josephus in book 5, chap. 1 of his "Antiquities of the Jews," distinctly states that on the first day the priests with a guard of armed men and with the senate following them, carried the ark around the city. They did this for six days, and on the seventh "the army" was called together and set in order against the city to be ready for action, the people being also summoned. It is nowhere stated that all the army and the people marched around the city and the inference is that they did not, but that they all joined in the shouting and that the army entered the fallen city at the opportune moment and put its inhabitants to the sword.

"Student," Philadelphia, Pa. What is the age of the oldest Bible in existence? Is it the same as the one we now use?

The oldest Bibles we have found are those known as the Sinaitic, Vatican and the Alexandrian Bibles. They are believed to have been written in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. They differ from ours in containing some books that are now omitted, such as the "Epistle of Barnabas," "The Shepherd of Hermes," "The Epistle of Clement," and the "Epistle of Athanasius." These books have long been rejected from the canon as of doubtful authenticity or authority. We know from the writings of the Fathers that they possessed a similar Bible. Clement, who lived about the year 180 A. D., gives a list of the books in the Bible he used, and it is practically the same as ours with three additions. The Shepherd of Hermes, the Epistle of Barnabas and the Apocalypse of Peter. He expresses the opinion that these are of inferior value, and also speaks doubtfully of the second Epistle of John and the Epistle of Jude. The minute care which the Jews took to have every copy of t law and the prophets absolutely accurate is guarantee that the books of the Old Testame as we have them have not been tamper with. You will find a great deal of valual information on this subject in "Our sixty-s Sacred Books," by Dr. Edwin W. Rice, Publis ed by the American Sunday School Uni Philadelphia.

B. B. Should Christians kneel when they pray

The posture is nothing, the condition of heart everything. People have prayed in blinding storm, on the battle-field, on hor back, and in every imaginable attitude a condition, and their prayers, being from heart, have reached the ear of the Almigh Kneeling, however, is an attitude of reveren and adoration, and is therefore an eminen proper one for the Christian to assume wl addressing the throne of grace.

J. Lyght, Philadelphia. Can we prove the in tion and authenticity of the Bible by evidence without referring to any passage

The two questions are distinct. The au ticity of the Bible is being proved by th records on monuments, by the tablets rec deciphered, and by discoveries in Bible l That is if by authenticity you mean its hi cal truth. As to inspiration, the best evi is its effects. The man who loves the and tries to conduct his life according precepts, is a better man for the effort. Bible-reading nation advances in the bes of civilization caring for its poor and aff and becoming in all ways better. Anothe dence of its being inspired is the revelat gives a man of himself, holding a mirror gaze by which he recognizes himself. An evidence is its survival. No book was more violently attacked; no book was more misused, yet it has outlived the at of foes and the faults of friends and is re today more widely than ever. These are of the reasons for believing it came from Beside this there is the reason Mr. A gave very tersely, "I know that it is in because it inspires me." That is the evi from experience which is the best of all.

Reader, Hamilton, Ont. Are the talents referred to in the parable Matt. — talents for work only for spiritual work.

The parable was given to explain the principles of the last judgment. From one who had been well endowed much would be expected, and a smaller result would be looked for from one who had received less. Only he would be punished who had made no effort to use his talents to account. Christ probably intended it to apply to every kind of gift. Men of wealth, of education, of spiritual privilege, with any kind of opportunity for doing good were affected by it. A man must do the best he could in his circumstances, and if he could not do as well, or as much as, another who was better equipped, he would not be blamed. The distinction between worldly and spiritual is somewhat vague in this instance. The man who gives to a starving family is not exactly doing spiritual work, but it is this kind of work that this parable would apply to.

IF WE KNEW.

All if humanity but knew
What mighty things a prayer might do
To still the tempest in the breast,
And bring the troubled spirit rest,
The lips would not be half so slow
To frame the messages which go Straight into that Almighty ear
Which bends so low these cries to hear.

If man thought were not so blind
To what the Father has designed,
It could not misinterpret so
The countless things we partly know,
And sometimes misapply the thought
Of plainest lessons which are taught,
Churn to bitterness of gall
The grandest purposes of all.

If man hands could lift the veil,
And see how fervent prayers prevail
With him whose promises they plead,
To each humanity its need,
What inspiration would be lent
To plead for the impenitent,
And with what courage souls would dare
Besiege the throne of grace in prayer.

Spanish-American Home-Life.

The People of Nicaragua and their Simple, Primitive Ways—Mule Traveling—In Banana-Land—Chocolate and Coffee Growing.

ALTHOUGH they are almost our next-door neighbors, the Nicaraguans are but little known to the people of the United States. Should the great canal project ever be carried out successfully, however, we are very likely to know each other better. Archibald Ross Colquhoun, who recently visited Nicaragua for the special purpose of visiting the canal question, very interestingly describes some phases of life in that country. Everything is exceedingly primitive. There are few railways and all travel is by mule and carreta—a sort of rustic wagon, which goes about a mile an hour over roads that are full of quagmires broken up by overflowing streams. Yet, in spite of these drawbacks, when a Nicaraguan sets out on a journey, he usually carries with him a load of traps and baggage, such as birds in cages, and bedding, etc. Life is an easy-going simple problem to these Central Americans, who, having no such civilization as ours, have not yet learned to hurry, but take events philosophically under all circumstances. They have all the traditional indolence of the Spanish character, and even in their capital city, bustle and activity are unknown. Business is always postponed as much as possible and the phrase "manana! manana!" ("to-morrow! to-morrow!") is heard on every side. There are some fine cities, the four most notable being Don, Rivas, Granada and Managua, the latter and newest being the siest. Hotels are scarce, very poor, very dirty and dear; baths are almost an unknown luxury and the native cooking something at which even the most rural American would shudder, so largely do oil and garlic predominate. Chocolate and coffee, home-grown, are the principal table beverages, and a favorite dish is "iste," which is composed of parched corn mixed with chocolate, sugar, and water. Everything connected with public and domestic life is essentially Spanish—as much so as if nothing had been changed since the conquest. Windows are paneless and iron-barred, with stout wooden shutters inside, and are closed from morning till afternoon to exclude heat and dust. Rooms interiors are bare and uncomfortable. At social gatherings, especially in the country, the sexes are strictly divided. Woman's work among the well-to-do, is trivial and seems devised to kill time alone. There are few amusements, one of the principal being a weekly paseo or parade on the plaza; but there is a great deal of church-going, and the priests have a potent influence. Yet, with all the prevailing strictness, the standard of morality is by no means a high one.

The two illustrations present scenes familiar to all who have been in Nicaragua.

On the streets, in every city, the water-vender is met at frequent intervals, supplying customers from his precious burden, and the loading up of the green bananas on the wharves is a matter of almost hourly occurence in the season. Many varieties of fruit grow to perfection in the soft Nicaraguan climate and there are delicacies from orchard and garden on the table all the year round.

Empty Cradles.

In whatever way cradles have been made empty, may they not be filled with some living, blessed ministry of love? Need they stand forever empty, because the treasures they meant to hold no longer fill them? My old cradle in the garden (writes Mrs. Mary H. Perkins) says: "No. Put the seed of some loving act or word gained from the memory of what has been, or the thought of what might have been, into that vacant place, and blossoms of blessing and joy to others will reward the sowing." Try it, you who look sadly at that which is gone or altogether missed out of your life. Fill the empty space with ministries which will gladden and benefit some fellow-beings in this world of need, and your sometime emptiness may be full to overflowing with the sweetness and beauty of service for the Master, and bright with the joy of his smile.

Fretting a Sin.

There is one sin, writes Helen Hunt, which it seems to me is everywhere and by everybody is underestimated and quite too much overlooked in valuations of character. It is the sin of fretting. It is as common as air, as speech; so common that unless it rises above its usual monotone, we do not even observe it. Watch an ordinary coming together of people and we see how many minutes it will be before somebody frets—that is, makes more or less complaining statement of something or other, which most probably every one in the room, or the car, or on the street corner, knew before, and which most probably nobody can help. Why say anything about it? It is cold, it is hot, it is wet, it is dry; somebody has broken an appointment, ill-cooked a meal; stupidity or bad faith somewhere has resulted in discomfort. There are plenty of things to fret about. It is simply astonishing how much annoyance and discomfort may be found in the course of every day's living, even at the simplest, if one only keeps a sharp eye put on that side of things.

Patient Burden-Bearers.

Here is a little incident, related by Amelia Barr, which points a profitable lesson to young girls: Not long ago I met a young lady in poverty whom I had previously known in wealth, and this was, in substance the story she told me: "Father died suddenly in Washington, and the professional skill through which he had coined money for us died with him. I am not weeping because we are poor. I am broken-hearted because none of us saw that he was dying. Was it not pitiful that he should think it best not to tell any of us that he was sick? And I, his petted daughter, though I knew he was taking opium to soothe his great pain, was so absorbed by my lovers, my games and my dresses, that I just hoped it would all come right. If I could only remember that even once I had pitied his sufferings or felt anxious about his life, I might bear his loss better!"

The story is common enough. Many a father, year after year, goes in and out of his home carrying the burden and doing the labor of life, while those whom he tenderly loves hold with but careless hands all of honor and gold he wins by toil and pain. Then some day his head and hands can work no more! And the hearts that have not learned the great lesson of unselfish love while love was their teacher, must now begin their sad duty when love has left them alone forever.

THE ELDEST SISTER.

I NEVER saw a man who wasn't proud of his eldest daughter, writes Ruth Ashmore. He may love his boys, but this oldest girl gets very close to his heart, and she can do much to make life pleasanter to him. To my sorrow I have seen her sit and sulk when he was present, I have seen her complaining because she didn't have what all the other girls had, and I have known her to think that her father represented a money-making machine, bound to take care of her and give her a good time. And she might be more. When father comes home in the evening, it ought to be her place to greet him with a smile and as much merriment as she can. It is her honor to be his daughter, and that means to give him all the pleasure possible and to keep from him the little frets and worries. Sometimes if a question of great importance comes to her, she goes to him to ask how it shall be solved, and if she has been a good daughter she will certainly get from him considerate advice.

I know a man who says that his oldest daughter would make pleasant the poorest home that can be imagined. He says no matter how much everybody else is down in the depths, she always has a merry greeting, an interesting topic, or a pleasant question for discussion that interests everybody else and puts down the inclinations of the other members of the family to tell of the woes and worries, as a sauce for dinners, rather than of their pleasures. I call that being a great deal to one's father.

Susannah Wesley and her Sons.

It is related of Susannah Wesley, that she held so completely the love of her well-trained family, that after her sons had risen to places of responsibility, one of them wrote another: "Let us pray God that she may not die; for if she were to die, I could not live." At the hour of her departure, she said to her children: "When I am gone, stand around my bed and sing a hymn of praise." They did as requested. If they who go from us know what we are doing—and who dares to say they do not—it must please them far more to have us take up our part with courage and zeal, than to see us spend the hours in heart-break and gloom. The right thing is for us to give our sorrows to the Lord, learning from them a deeper self-effacement, while he fills us with joy and peace in believing, and enables us to abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost. Then we will not care to indulge inordinately in expressions of grief either in manner or dress.

Good and Bad Tempers.

Evenness of temper is a sign of mental and physical health. A serene mind and an even temper enable us to bear with a degree of equanimity the petty trials and jars of life, especially those arising from contact with scolding, irascible, irritating persons. Serenity comes easy to some and hard to others. It can be taught and learned. To the Christian, there may and doubtless will come times of unusual perturbation. At such times, when the temper is sorely tried, the best refuge is found in prayer and the surest medicine in God's holy Word.

FAVORITE PROMISES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Beginning Nov. 10th. II. Peter 3: 8-14.

ONE of the most striking proofs of the divine origin of the Bible is its adaptation to the needs of so many varieties of men and circumstances and periods. Men of every race, and station, of all times, at all periods of their lives, in every conceivable situation, have gone to it and have found inspiration, strength, or comfort suitable to their need. Soldiers like Gordon and Havelock, statesmen like Gladstone and Sumner, merchants like Budgett and Lawrence, poets like Whittier and Tennyson—men of every type, cultured and ignorant, rich and poor, have loved the old Book and have gained from it guidance and help. It has words for times of joy and times of sorrow; for the bride and the bereaved mother; for the king on his throne and for the slave in his hut; for the shepherd at the sheepfold and the sailor in the storm; for the student in his library and the hurrying trader in the market; for the bounding, enthusiastic youth and the bed-ridden octogenarian, waiting the coming of the last enemy; for the wealthy citizen and for the penniless exile—it is a universal treasury from which every needy soul may draw for his particular and special need. Among its many promises every Christian has some that are special favorites. In some instances they have been appropriated, tested and proved and in others they are precious because their fulfilment though necessarily future is of a blessing which that particular soul specially needs. Thus the promises divide themselves into two groups—those for present use and those which reach fruition after death. Among the former, there are the promises of answers to prayer, of guidance in perplexing circumstances; of succor in adversity; of support in sorrow and bereavement; of sympathy in persecution; of strength to resist temptation; and of the Holy Spirit's help in spiritual growth. Such promises as these the Christian may take to God in prayer and present them to him for fulfilment, as he would take a check to the bank and present it for payment. God honors them, as all those testify who have pleaded them at his throne, and they, most confidently, who have pleaded them most frequently. Every such promise fulfilled becomes a treasured possession. One business man in New York used to say that the third chapter of Proverbs had been his main capital when he started in business and was the most precious of all chapters to him all through his business life. Again and again in financial crisis he had taken it to God, and had found him ready to do all, and more than all, that he had promised. To many a tried and harassed man there is no promise so precious as the one that God will keep in perfect peace him whose mind is stayed on him. (Isa. 26: 3.) In the varied experiences of life the value of various promises is realized, and as they are proved to be no mere forms, but actual pledges, they became supremely precious. Of the other group we may also make present use for consolation and hope. The mourner can never forget that the day is coming when God will wipe away every tear; the weak and trembling Christian that he will yet be like Christ, "for he will see him as he is;" All these and many more promises have given peace and happiness to hearts aching with the woes of this life. They are more precious than gold. It will be a delightful hour in many societies when one after another rises to tell how some promise has been there and support to him when all else failed.

AN AFRICAN SCHOOL REVIVAL.

Mr. C. L. Goodenough, a missionary of the American Board at Umzumbe, Natal, writes of a wonderful revival in a girls' school there.

"It began in much prayer, as such awakenings generally do—prayer that the pupils might be truly awakened to a sense of sin. Then it became apparent that God was dealing individually with these souls. Often one or two would seek their teachers privately for prayer and counsel. Any calling out of inquirers en masse was avoided, so that the prevailing seriousness had expression only as the Spirit brought it from the heart to the lip. The girls sought quiet corners on the school grounds where they might pray alone, or little groups gathered to study the Bible of their own accord. Several passed through a time of distress on account of sin and at length found peace at the Cross. There were some very bright conversions, and the tender feeling in the school deepened until the one engrossing subject so filled all hearts that it seemed best to waive the usual routine of study and turn the evening lesson hour into a prayer-meeting. Several broke down utterly and cried for mercy. The next morning it was impossible to proceed with the ordinary lessons, so the teachers wisely changed the order of the morning into a season of personal work for those in agony of soul. It was a blessed morning's work. Their teacher writes:

"'The Divine Spirit was certainly there and displayed his power to heal sin-sick souls. Gradually the weeping and sorrow gave place to peace and joy as one after another entered into life in Christ. . . . We felt it was truly the Lord's own work and he was conducting it himself.'"

THE SOUTH'S GREAT EXPOSITION.

Thousands of Visitors from Near and Far Crowding Atlanta—A Brilliant Success—The Buildings and Grounds Described—The Exhibits.

LAST month will be long remembered in the South as the occasion of the brilliant opening of the Cotton States and International Exposition in the city of Atlanta, Ga. It was singularly fitting that this magnificent illustration of the nation's unity and goodwill should be held on a site which thirty years ago witnessed some of the greatest military operations of the Civil War. From the day of its opening up the present time, the Exposition has been a steadily increasing success. Our own States and a number of foreign governments are liberally and appropriately represented, and nothing has been spared, in point of energy, enterprise, and outlay to make the Exposition worthy of the New South, whose industrial and commercial progress it suitably illustrates.

CHARLES A. COLLIER,
President and Director General.

At the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, the representation of the Southern States was regarded as inadequate and hardly proportionate to its extensive interests. The present Exposition was designed to do the South justice in this regard and also to foster the trade relations existing between the Southern States and the republics of Mexico and South America, as well as Europe. Piedmont Park, two miles from Atlanta, was chosen as the site, and the general government appropriated $200,000 for a government building and exhibit. About $2,000,000 in all, will be expended in connection with the Fair.

All visitors agree that the transformation of Atlanta from its usual aspect to the dignity and beauty of an Exposition City, is wonderful and complete. All the resources of architectural skill, of arboriculture and landscape-gardening have been employed in devising scenes and effects that combine both beauty and utility. Although at some points the visitor is reminded of the Chicago Fair, the Atlanta Exposition has a character wholly unique, and in no single instance can it be said to be patterned after the model of the last World's Fair. As viewed from any surrounding eminence, or from the roof of any of the Exposition buildings, the spectacle presented is a most brilliant one. Noble structures of varied architectural design, from the classic to the modern, front on wide avenues or splendid plazas. Inland lake, dotted with small craft, have been added to the attractions of the place, and nearly all the great buildings have water frontage. Launches and gondolas ply on the lakes, taking visitors from one part of the grounds to another.

Parks of ornamental trees, with clumps of artistic shrubbery make a cool and attractive picture. Fountains toss their feathery spray high in air. And through it all an ever-moving, ever-changing human panorama lends life, and motion, and interest to the whole. At night, when the entire grounds are ablaze with electric lights, the effect is that of a scene from fairy-land.

The important structures may be mentioned briefly. The United States government has erected a Romanesque building with a floor area of 65,000 square feet for its exhibits, which include historical documents, relics, books, early treaties, portraits and maps. The Interior Department, United States Fish Commission, Forestry and Mining Divisions, Navy and War Departments also have large and valuable exhibits, the naval models being especially fine. In State exhibits, Georgia early takes a leading place. Florida, South Carolina, Alabama and the South generally making a really magnificent showing of their various industries. Most of the other States are well represented. New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Alabama, California and Georgia have special buildings on the grounds. California's exhibit is a notable one. The U. S. Government's exhibit in connection with the cotton plant is a feature of universal interest, showing as it does all the operations necessary in handling cotton, from the planting of the seed until the crop is marketed. In the Machinery Building are shown all the various kinds of mechanical appliances now used in the development of the agricultural and other resources of the South and especially in her manufactures.

The Fine Arts Building contains the most notable collection of pictures ever seen in the South. In the Woman's Building, which is under the management of Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Gordon, there are so many artistic attractions that it would be difficult to enumerate them. One of the most notable is the Calendar of Southern women, in which each month is represented by a typical Southern woman, the leading one being Miss Winnie Davis, of Mississippi. The building itself, designed by women, is a triumph of art. It contains some remarkable educational exhibits, including technical instructions as connected with the industrial arts, besides ceramics, painting, cooking school, and kindergarten exhibits. Mrs. Joseph Thompson, of Atlanta, is President of the Woman's Board.

One of the finest buildings on the ground is the Auditorium, with a seating capacity of 3000. The Art Palace is located upon the summit of an elevation between the Manufactures Building and the United States Government Building. It has a frontage of 245 feet and is 100 feet deep, the central facade being fifty feet in height. This beautiful building is designed after the Italian Renaissance. The Electricity and Transportation Buildings are both extensive and imposing structures, and that devoted to Mines and Forestry holds the most complete and comprehensive exhibition of the flora of the South ever gathered together. This exhibit is under the charge of the Chief of the National Bureau of Forestry, and is one of the most instructive lessons of the Exposition. The different results obtained by good and bad forestry are shown by models, and the best of these are three models of a 160-acre farm in the hill-lands of the South, showing the difference between proper and improper care. This is an object lesson that should be of great value to Southern farmers generally.

Of course, the Southern exhibits constitute one of the most important attractions of the fair. Those of Georgia and Florida occupy large space. South Carolina has one of the finest among the State exhibits, Alabama, too, has done handsomely in the showing of iron, coal and varied minerals, North and South Carolina are well represented in fisheries, mines and agriculture, and Louisiana is nowise behind the others. Practically all the Southern States are in evidence, with their best industrial products, the cotton States making an especially valuable and attractive presentation.

Invitations were sent through the State Department of the United States to all foreign countries of importance, and a number accepted and were allotted space at the Exposition. Mexico, Venezuela, the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, Guatemala, Chili, Honduras and Nicaragua were among the first to accept. These especially appreciated the fact that the present International Exposition afforded the opportunity of fostering trade between the Southern States and the republics of Mexico and Central and South America. Accordingly, the leading South American governments made liberal appropriations for representation at the Fair.

One department which is of universal interest to all visitors is the Negro exhibit. This is contained in the Negro Building, a very handsome structure, made like all the others, of timber and staff, and with a length of 278 feet, a width of 112, and a height of seventy feet. The Afro-American exhibit occupies 25,000 square feet of space and is a splendid showing of the progress made by the negro since the days of his emancipation. There are Departments of Invention, Church and Home, Education, &c. I. Garland Penn, a negro of Lynchburg, Va., is in charge of the exhibit.

Among the attractions that make the Exposition a source of pleasure and recreation are many features that were prominent at the last World's Fair, including Mexican, Chinese and Japanese villages, the picturesque and tortuous streets of Cairo, Temple of Illusions, the Flying Wheel and last, but not least, the Electrical Fountain in the centre of Clara Mere, which is probably the most popular object on the grounds. Water in four forms is employed, viz., a stream, a geyser, a spray and a fog bank. An electric light of 250,000 candle power radiates the water and illuminates it with all the colors of the rainbow.

All the arrangements of the Exposition managers for transportation, accommodation, &c., have proved exceedingly satisfactory. The President of the Exposition is C. A. Collier, of the Capital City Bank of Atlanta, and he is assisted by an experienced Board of Managers. By act of Congress, foreign exhibits have been admitted free. President Collier had made this statement:

"The immediate advantages of the exhibition will be felt in New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, because it will create a demand for the manufactures in these States to which we are now supplying the raw material, and with which we are not quite ready to compete; but the competion will come. It is now developing, and in a very short while we hope we will be able to directly reap the benefits, the seeds of which we are now sowing."

As a whole, the Exposition, apart from its important commercial aspects, is noteworthy by reason of the brotherly feeling it fosters and encourages, not only among the States of our own Union, but between the peoples who live in remote lands and ourselves. Every such opportunity for an international exchange of friendly courtesies has a much broader significance than that which relates to trade alone. It makes for peace and goodwill throughout the world. The South is to be congratulated on the success of its Exposition and upon the brilliant prospects it discloses in every avenue of productive industry—an outlook that contains a most favorable presage for the commerce of the whole country, while it is a forecast of increased prosperity for the South itself.

"WHO IS THIS JESUS?"

[The Turkish soldier's question to his wife after the massacre at Sassoon.]

"WHO is this 'Jesus of Nazareth?'"
The Mussulman soldier caught his breath,
And knit his brow, like a man oppressed
Whom the soft divan had brought no rest.

He had come from a field of God accursed;
He had fought where devils did their worst!
The fearful fray he would fain forget—
In his soul its echoes were ringing yet.

"Who is this 'Jesus of Nazareth?'
The women all called his name in death:
And the very children, caught to impale—
Nay!—not for a woman's ear that tale!

"Your blood would freeze at its very fount;
Yet the fire up into your brain would mount,
Till you shrieked at night, when the winds awoke,
And, shuddering, cowered till morning broke.

"Nay, ask no question! I know not why
The women and harmless babes must die.
'Twas my chief's to order—mine to obey.
Be it on his head at the Judgment Day!

"Yes—there was one alternative:
'Call on our Prophet, and you live!'
But every victim, with dying breath,
Called upon 'Jesus of Nazareth!'

"Who is this 'Jesus of Nazareth?'
Does he bear the sword that conquers Death?
Must I meet him there, when Azrael calls
My naked soul to the Judgment halls?

"Go—ask the Giaours—and tell me true,
Who is this 'Jesus of Nazareth?' Who?
I have fought for Allah! But if He be Allah's vicegerent—woe is me!"

Jesus of Nazareth! Lord of Life,
Conqueror of all this world's mad strife!
Vengeance for blood that cries to thee!
Bow the False Prophet on bended knee,

Till the Cross shall quench the Crescent's ray
From St. Sophia to the Gates of Day;
And murderous Moslem, with contrite breath,
Shall call upon Jesus of Nazareth!

THE RUM TRAFFIC IN AFRICA.

Thirty-five years ago in the public marketplace on the old Calabar River, Africa, human flesh was sold just like beef. While this atrocity has ceased, destruction is coming in another form. Recent reports presented to the British Parliament show that the increase of duties paid within two years upon spirituous liquors at Old Calabar has been 225 per cent. In 1892, 1,350,751 gallons were imported; in 1894 (March 31) the quantity had nearly doubled, being 2,609,558 gallons. This is a terrible record.

NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

THE GENERAL INQUIRES ABOUT THE STUNDISTS.

CHAPTER XVI.

Letter from Mikhail.

ON that side of Slavo farthest from the river, the side, namely, where most of the Stundists lived, the steppe rolls away in gentle undulations to the East until its monotonous expanse seems ended by a long low ridge topped with a thin fringe of pines that look blue and shadowy when seen from the high ground of the village. Outside the General's grounds these were the only trees in all the country-side, and although they were sparse and only poorly developed, the peasants dignified them by the name of forest, and peopled them of course with evil-minded elves and other uncanny beings that haunt trees and do hurt to the mortal wights who are unfortunate enough to disturb their nocturnal gambolings. The grandmothers of Slavo have a story, with numerous variants of course, of a man who was in the forest once upon a time cutting firewood. Night came on before he could get clear of the trees, and great troops of dancing things, half human and half goat, suddenly appeared and capered around him in mad dances and then pinched him to death with their horny fingers. Even among the more incredulous youth of the village there were found some who when the wind blew from the woods declared they heard weird sounds of strange revelry, songs sung by no mortal voices, sometimes sounding like the songs in a mad saturnalia, sometimes like a dirge sung by [illegible].

The Stundists, driven from Mikhail's house by the watchful and ubiquitous uriadnik used to worship in their hollow in the steppe, and on that meeting-place proving insecure, in sequestered spots among the reeds by the river, and had finally decided to take to the forest. They could think of no safer place. The superstitions about the elves and satyrs they laughed at. The story about the man pinched to death was very terrible, but they did not believe it in this form. But those sounds or songs which the sharp-eared youths had heard they could perhaps explain, and when they heard of them they were careful ever after to modulate their voices when they sang hymns with the wind blowing over to Slavo.

Ever since the departure of their young preacher, and that was more than six months, the Stundists had had a miserable time of it. Not that their experiences previously had been of the pleasantest, but they had been just bearable; and now, as poor Vassily Pavlitch wrote to Mikhail, they led a dog's life, the life a dog leads without his master, he wrote in compliment to the absent Mikhail.

The General had been distinguishing himself as an inquisitor. He had no very clear ideas of Stundism. All he knew was that the priest said it was a pestilent heresy, dangerous alike to church and state, and that unless the fatherland was freed from its pernicious influence, religion and all that Russia held most dear must inevitably perish. He knew no other way to [illegible] own narrow views of truth. The uriadnik and the village pope were now his constant councillors, and the staple of their deliberations was the Stundists and how to crush them. To his credit it must be said that at first the General was for milder measures. For instance, he suggested to the priest that he should meet three or four of the leaders of the heretics at his house and discuss with them the points of difference between orthodoxy and Stundism, but the priest, knowing his own imperfections in dialectics and the strength of the Stundists in holy living and in a deep knowledge of the Scriptures, fought shy of the proposed meeting. It was then the turn of the three worthies we have mentioned, the principle authorities of the village, to make suggestions. They made suggestions and the General assisted in carrying them out.

Two of the Stundist leaders, both of them young men with families, were selected by the priest for punishment. The bishop of the diocese was communicated with, and a monastery near Moscow was chosen, to which they were sent for discipline. But in the short space of two months the archimandrite in charge of the monastery wrote to the priests that the two Stundists, instead of doing penance and attending the numerous services, occupied themselves in endless disputations with the monks, and that the simple brotherhood, hearing their arguments for the first time, felt inclined to admit their validity.

"I had to instruct my own monks in orthodoxy," he wrote. "The monks are all set by the ears, and unless you take your Stundists away we shall have heresy within our very walls, and what then?"

So the Stundists were removed, and the priest's plan of discipline voted a failure.

Then it was the uriadnik's chance. He obtained the General's consent to invite some twenty of the Stundists to his house, in order, ostensibly, to arrange with them some details of police administration. As soon as all were assembled five or six of his friends who had been collected together for the purpose, rushed into the room with blackened faces and beat the miserable Stundists so unmercifully that blood flowed and bones were broken. Three Stundists who tried to escape were bound with cords, imprisoned in a damp cellar for a week, and half starved with a miserable pittance of black bread and water. But as time went on it was soon seen that even these most drastic of measures had no effect, and the starshina was invited to devise a plan for taming men who showed so stubborn a love for the faith that was in them.

Now the starshina, or elder, is a person of great authority and consequence in Russian villages. If a man of any leading he practically rules the village assembly, and the orthodox peasants of Slavo, still a large majority of the village, were only too willing to let him rule. It saved them trouble and worry. The starshina's plan to plague the Stundists saved them trouble, and they speedily agreed to it. In connection with every village there is a great deal of what is known as communal work, the performance of which benefits the whole commune—draining the common land, erecting fences, regulating the water supply, watching the village at night, and so on. The peasants are drafted to this work in groups, and the group which works at communal labor to-day, for instance, may not be called on again for the next three months. The starshina suggested that as the Stundists were said to be fond of going out at night to their meetings, they would be more usefully employed as night watchmen. The villagers agreed to relieving themselves entirely of this obnoxious duty and transferring it to the Stundists. Next the starshina suggested that as these obstinate heretics were almost all well-to-do people they could afford time for the communal labor much better than their poorer neighbors. Also agreed to unanimously. All the communal labor, therefore, was imposed on them. In July when the orthodox were reaping their grain the Stundists were hedging and ditching for the village, and when their communal work was finished the rain had destroyed their harvest. They murmured and grumbled of course, but they were in a minority; they had no redress, and the starshina threatened that if they showed any opposition he would liberally assess the value of the labor and confiscate their goods to that amount. One man with temerity enough to speak of petitioning the Governor of Kief had his head broken. Another for having offered to prepare the petition was ducked in the river.

It was a grim satire that while these cruel oppressions were taking place in Russia, the Russian army was fighting to deliver the Bulgarians from the oppression of the Turkish Sultan. The sufferings of the Christians in Turkey, and the fact that they could not worship God according to their conscience distressed the Czar, while he was utterly indifferent to the sufferings of his own Stundist subjects and was not at all troubled about their not being able to worship God according to their conscience. But then there was nothing to be gained by protecting Stundists, while by freeing the Bulgarians a step was gained on the way to Constantinople.

Toward the close of autumn—it was a beautiful Saturday afternoon in November, the little Stundist community was in a state of extreme agitation at some news that had been secretly carried round from one to the other of them. It was great news: Vassily Pavlitch had received a letter from Mikhail. They were invited to a service in the forest, and before the service began the letter was to be read. It was their first meeting for a month. The time appointed was two hours after sunset. It was nearly seven months since the spring evening when they had watched the departing carriage bearing Mikhail away to Kief, and they had often wondered what had happened that he had not written. His welfare had been the theme of many an earnest prayer.

More than fifty of them, men mostly, made their way secretly and silently, no two of them together, across to the low ridge where the pines grew. The night was cold, but their hearts burned within them, for were they not going to worship God in common, and to hear the news, the rumor went that it was good news about their beloved Mikhail? Wrapped in their sheep-skins they assembled in a little hollow among the trees and lighted two or three rough lanterns. Vassily Pavlitch stood before them the letter in his hands.

"Brethren," said Vassily, "I think we are all here." The good man was puffed up with his importance on this special occasion. "Now sit down, and I will read you Misha's letter." He opened the paper and read as follows:

"Dear Brother in the Lord Jesus, Vassilyev:

"Peace to you and all the brothers and sisters in Slavo. How my heart longs for Slavo! Read this letter first to my dear mother, and then to the brethren, and, when they have heard it, let it go to the other villages where the brethren know me. I have little time to write, and we may be called any minute; but Panitch Sergei is writing and he told me I might also write. We are both well, thank God. O Vassily, we have had awful things to go through ever since the beginning of July! We were then encamped near the Lom River, and what I saw I will never forget. There is a little village there called Kasilevo, and we had to leave it to go out and watch some Turks. We left about a hundred Bulgarians in the village—old men, women and children. When we were away the Bashi Bazouks came, and the people must have run into the church for shelter. When we came back they had all been murdered. Panitch Sergei and I went into the church at night with some others to see if any one still lived, and there they were all drenched in blood, lying [illegible] over the floor. Panitch's face was [illegible] rible to look at.

"Since then we have been ordered on [illegible] Plevna. Here it is also frightful, ev[illegible] day more horrible than the day before. [illegible] few nights ago the Turkish shells w[illegible] just screaming over us, and where I [illegible] as soon as the firing slackened a bi[illegible] could hear the air full of the groans of [illegible] wounded below in the hollow, and [illegible] and then a yell of agony when the pr[illegible]ing Turks would murder a wounded n[illegible] Next morning we had to cross the gro[illegible] where the fighing had been, and, as I [illegible] lowed in the rear of Panitch's troop, I [illegible] the faces of the wounded men still l[illegible] by scores all along the road. We c[illegible] not ride fast as we feared to tread on [illegible] bodies, and some poor fellows, wound[illegible] slightly, had fallen asleep right across [illegible] dusty road and never wakened as we [illegible] past them. No one knows how miser[illegible] we felt at leaving them there, for we k[illegible] that the Bashi Bazouks were coming [illegible] behind us and would butcher them [illegible] their helplessness.

"We are just in from a long ride of [illegible] days. We met swarms of flying Bu[illegible]ians from the villages. They were co[illegible]ing and shaking with terror. We [illegible] one crowd of them of about a hund[illegible], chiefly women and babies, and when [illegible]itch halted and spoke to them they b[illegible] crying and said they were starving. I [illegible] close behind and heard every word. [illegible] easily understand what the people [illegible] say. So Panitch ordered the troop to [illegible]. 'My brave fellows,' he sang out, 'w[illegible] help?' He told me to hand out al[illegible] bread. I did the same with mine, a[illegible] did every man of the troop. I saw [illegible] fellows fish odd coppers out of their [illegible]kets, which they had been hoarding to [illegible] tobacco, every copeck they possess. I believe, and we handed all over t[illegible] Bulgarians, who just looked like skele[illegible]s. Some of our fellows joked roughly wit[illegible] women, but I know if they had not [illegible] they would have wept. Their [illegible]es meant a tear and a blessing. But we [illegible] we just starving ourselves when w[illegible] back to camp after fasting thirty hou[illegible]

"Panitch has only given me a very [illegible] piece of paper. You'll be glad that w[illegible] hundreds of chances to say a G[illegible] word, and how glad every one is to [illegible] it! Panitch bought ten New Testa[illegible]nts when we were in Galatz from a man [illegible] called a colporteur, and gave them t[illegible] worst men in his troop. When we c[illegible] we have glorious meetings. Panitch [illegible] sometimes. All the men very [illegible]rly worship him. I must finish now. If I only had more paper! Brother, te[illegible] the brethren to be faithful. I long to be [illegible] among you to hear your voices an[illegible] see your dear faces again. Pray for us.

MIKHAIL KULMENK[illegible]

"Now, brethren, that's the [illegible]ter. We'll talk about it afterwards. W[illegible] are glad to hear that Misha and Panit[illegible] are well. We'll sing now. Suppose w[illegible] ing Misha's hymn beginning, 'Lord our Strength, on Thee we rest?'"

"But what about the wind?" [illegible]d a timid voice from the darkness. "It [illegible]ws right over homeward."

"Oh, never mind the wind," said [illegible]'assily Pavlitch smiling, "they will thi[illegible] its the fairies."

Writing from Calcutta, India, Miss S. J. Gardner, an American Missionary, gives this cheering picture of her work among the Bengali children:

"It seems to me in our work among women and children there never was a time that must tell on future time as this. What are the sounds that greet our ears? Thousands of little girls reciting our Scripture, singing our hymns, passing clever examinations in the Word of God. Among our own nearly thirteen hundred Bengali girls gathered in our schools; nearly every one speaks of Jesus reverently, lovingly, many declaring themselves as belonging to him, a position from which the most skilful questioning is not able to oust them. Who are these children?—daughters of Hindus, both high and low caste; children of idol worshipers most of them, and what will they become? In five years and less, every one will be a wife and many of them mothers. This is a sound that must increase in volume when another short generation is passed. The women in the zenanas have thrown open their doors, and we enter, not with crochet needle or worsted work, but with an open Bible in our hands, and find a welcome. We have in Calcutta and our villages more women who want us to come with the Bible alone than we could visit had we double or three times our present force, and so it is everywhere and in every department of our work. The sounds tell of better things ahead."

CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Hunter's Treatment.

The article in the World of Sunday, Sept 15, concerning Dr. Hunter's cure for consumption created a vast amount of comment in medical circles and among those afflicted. It was followed by a large number of applications for treatment and an avalanche of letters of inquiry by mail.

Dr. Hunter's office, at No. 117 West Forty-fifth Street, New York, is a Mecca for consumptives and catarrhal and bronchial sufferers, and is certainly a haven to all those so afflicted.—N.Y. World, Oct. 6th.

SAVAGES AND THE DELUGE.

It would seem that the story of the Dele is almost universal. Even among the vage dwarfs of the Andaman Islands, ere is a legend of a great inundation hich covered the whole earth and de-oyed all living things, save two men d two women who escaped in a canoe.
is calamity came upon the world through neglect of divine commands. These daman pigmies are short-lived, fifty ars among them being an extremely old
e. The wife of a chief has an authority long the women which corresponds to r husband's authority over the men. She eps these privileges when a widow if she s children; otherwise she loses them.
m eleven to thirteen years of age is for h sexes a period of rigid abstinence, ring which they must not eat turtle, rk, fish, or honey. Some of the customs the dwarfs are very odd. When a ld dies, its body is exhumed at the end three months. The father cleans the nes and paints the skull yellow. The nes are divided into fragments and made o necklaces, which are distributed long the friends of the family for souvrs.

On the Andamans, the pigmies do not low how to make fire, but only to keep idlive. They say that they got it origily from a god, but it may have been tained from one of two volcanoes in the ighborhood.

are soft, so soft they scarce can be called bones in the earlier years; gradually they harden, and furnish the frame which supports the growing body. The hardening comes from what chemists term "the mineral substances."

When these are absent we have "Rickets"—a lack of bone-tissue, which shows itself in delayed teething, profuse head-sweats, and later, if not arrested, malformations and deformities.

Such a baby needs lime for its weak bones and cod-liver oil for its fat-starved body. Scott's Emulsion of cod-liver oil, with hypophosphites, will give its little body the needed fat in the easiest form.

PATRICK, THE MISSIONARY.*

PATRICK'S birth took place in or near Dumbarton, among the Strathclyde Britons, and though the place of his birth is now in Scotland, yet for centuries before Patrick was born and for centuries afterward the place belonged to the Britons, from whom Patrick himself sprung.

Dumbarton town is situated at the confluence of the rivers Clyde and Leven, fourteen miles from Glasgow. The site was used as a naval station by the Romans, who called it Theodosia, and the arable lands around are composed of rich black loam, gravelly soil and clay, and the farmers thereon are thrifty and prosperous. The situation of Dumbarton Castle is eminently picturesque. The buildings composing the fort are perched on the summit of a rocky mount, shooting up to the height of two hundred and six feet sheer out of the alluvian plain on the east side of the river Leven. Four miles from this town toward Glasgow, on the line of the old Roman wall, is the modern town of Kilpatrick, which claims to be the birthplace of St. Patrick.

In confirmation of the statement that Dumbarton was the birthplace of Patrick, it may also be adduced that in the old hymn of Fiacc it is said that Patrick was born in Nemthur, and in the margin the writer states that "that is a city which is north Britain—viz., Ailcuide,"—the ancient name of Dumbarton. Other writers in the early centuries designate the same village as the place of his birth. In giving an account of himself Patrick does not tell where he was born, but simply relates that his father dwelt at Bannavem Taberniæ, where he also was living when he was taken captive. Bannavem means the river's mouth, and the sheds, shops and houses of entertainment set up for the accommodation of the Roman armies, whether of the temporary or stationary kind, were called Taberniæ. Here was his home, and of this place he was most probably a native.

We know nothing of Patrick's ancestry farther than two moves back. He himself tells us that he was the grandson of Potitus, the presbyter. If Patrick had thought that his clerical ancestor had disgraced himself by marriage, he would not probably have written that he was a minister of God's Word. But this he does in his "Confession," or creed, which was written when he was well advanced in years, so that even in his old age he did not believe in the celibacy of the clergy.

Of Potitus we can learn nothing except that his office was held in high esteem in his times. He was most likely a presbyter of the early British church, for his name does not prove that he was a Roman, as native names were often Latinized by the historian, as Patrick's own native baptismal name, Succath, was changed to Patricius, or Patrick. It is more likely that Potitus, Patrick's grandfather, was a Briton by birth, and that he studied the Scriptures and prayed in the little British kil, or church, at Alcluyd, and at its door preached to the people. Potitus seems to have lived to a good old age, and to have been worthy the respect of his grandson. It is some proof of his excellent family government that he reared a deacon. That deacon was Calpornius, the father of Patrick.

Calpornius was most probably a deacon in the evangelical British church at Alcluyd, a church that was not regulated after the Roman model of the present day, but sought to follow the order of the primitive church, without, it may be, having any perfect system of church government. But Patrick's father was also a decurio, as he himself also tells us. The decurio was a magistrate and counselor in the Roman colonies in Britain, and the office conferred a high rank on those who held it; they were members of the court and counselors of the city, and must have a certain amount of property. Such was the law of Constantine for the wealthy decurios. Such a man, then, was Patrick's father, honored both in the church and state, and we may fairly conclude that Calpornius ruled in the state like a good deacon of the church. We know nothing of Patrick's mother, except that tradition informs us that her name was Conchessa.

Pirates in those days, Danish and Irish and Scots, plowed continually the channels and seas around the British Isles, made inroads upon the land, plundering villages and towns, killing many, carrying off young and old to strange lands, and selling them into slavery. Irish ships in the period were chiefly "coracles," made of the skins of beasts and wicker or willow rods—a kind of boat, frail as it may seem, still used frequently in Arran, Achill and the western coast of Ireland.

In one of the piratical incursions Patrick and about two hundred others were seized, placed in boats, whose prows were turned down the Clyde and headed toward Ireland. What sad thoughts Patrick must have had as he gazed on the rock so near his home.

The boats which carried young Patrick and his companions with a load of spoils would be likely to land at some near point. Leaving the Firth of Clyde, a straight course west would bring them upon the Antrim coast of Ireland just where tradition fixes the landing. It is possible that in some little harbor between the Giant's Causeway and the mouth of the river Bann, Patrick's captors disembarked, and there touched the country which gave Patrick years of degradation and suffering, and a long life afterward of widespread Gospel truths.

How Consumption Arises and is N Cured!

II.

The Medical Profession of the civilized world concedes that consumption is always a disease the Lungs, and always caused by the bacteria For hundreds of years it was believed to a disease of the blood and general system, cause inheritance, on which false theory it was treate medicines given through the stomach, a treat so inevitably fatal that the disease came to garded as incurable.

The "Germ Theory" of Consumption, was promulgated by Dr. Martin, in 1722, adopte Dr. Barron, in 1819, by Dr. Carmichael in 18 Prof. Lanza in 1849, and by myself in 1

With these exceptions, the whole body of the fession held to the old doctrine and continu oppose and deny the truth of the Germ Theo til after Doctor Robert Koch of Berlin, in 1882, p its indisputable truth by showing, in the dis tissues, and in the expectorated matter fro lungs of consumptives, the actual germ that duce the disease. But even then the new d was neither generally accepted, nor the old ment changed. It was not until 18 that it c be publicly acknowledged by the Medical S as the only true theory. Consumption is now to be caused by the bacillus germ which lo and destroys the substance of the lungs as no devour raw flesh.

From whence do the germs come? The sphere is filled with countless millions of di kind, each of which has its appointed mis the economy of nature: can bodies and all things are consumed by them after death. are harmless to the healthy body, but assa prey upon all dead and diseased tissues.

The germs of the air are the cause of many ent diseases, each receiving a name according kind—Scald Head, Lepra Vulgaris, Ring W the Itch are common examples of germ disea

Consumption is caused by the tubercle a germ found in the air of all climates. In the lungs are effectually guarded against th lus by the Epithelium, a delicate tissue which lines the internal mucous surfaces air tubes and cells of the lungs just Cuticle covers the exterior skin of the bod

The Epithelium is the natural safe-gu the lungs. Without its protection every being would get consumption and the e depopulated, but while it remains unbro lungs are safe, and consumption cannot arise.

The chief diseases which endanger the lium and render us liable to consumptio Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma and Pneumon must first get a chronic inflammation of th surfaces, severe enough to break and des Epithelium, before you can get consumpti may have Chronic Bronchitis a long time the Epithelium is broken. These fistu the nursery from which consumption and therefore always dangerous.

Local Inflammations of the air passag lungs are easily and quickly cured b treatment applied to the lungs by inhalat never by stomach medication. After the lium is broken and the germs have bo lodgment in the lungs, no act, or series ach medication or change of air can ar lung disease. Nothing short of the de struction of the germs and their expuls the lungs will save the patients' life effected only by specific germicides aff reach to the germs and germ-destroying atom. Everything else inevitably fails.

A DESCENDANT OF PHARAOH.

TRAVELERS in the East frequently have strange experiences. In the course of a recent tour in Egypt, Rev. W. Jay Peck, an American pastor, had the unexpected pleasure of meeting at the American Mission in Cairo, a young, earnest, Egyptian Christian, named Salib Claudius. "... ib," writes Dr. Peck to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "traces his ancestry back

SALIB CLAUDIUS.

... one of the Pharaohs. Naturally, one would even so distantly descended from the Pharaohs of oppression and Exodus is an interesting personage. Salib has fine dark eyes, and is gifted with intelligence and an education fitting him for any polished society. I had many walks and talks, and found in him one of the truest followers of Christ. His great desire is the salvation of the Egyptians.

He is a man of most simple faith. His prayer for sick member of our party was as direct and simple as a request of a child, and he expected it to be answered—and it was. I marvelled at his great faith. He is a government officer of Middle Egypt, but carries the Gospel with him. God is using a Moody of him among his brethren.

The portrait of Salib, which appears on this page, was recently brought from Egypt by Dr. Peck.

"The Encyclopaedic Dictionary."

Some time since, the Chicago Herald concluded an exhaustive review of the Encyclopædic Dictionary with the assertion that "it is the only dictionary which gives all the words in the English language of to-day," and the Cincinnati Christian Standard, commenting upon the extensive vocabulary, superior word treatment, and the comprehensive encyclopædic character of this work, expressed the positive belief that "it has many distinctive claims to superiority over the older styles, and is destined to supplant them in popular favor."

Recent events have fully verified these opinions and predictions. Its vast superiority over all other reference books has been fully demonstrated, and it is fast supplanting the less modern and more cumbersome books in popular favor. If it be true that "success is the test of merit," there can be no doubt remaining as to the intrinsic value and practical utility of this magnificent monument of scholarship.

Less than a year ago the editors and printers were laboring day and night to put the finishing touches on this collossal literary structure, bringing it up in every detail to the month of February, 1895. To-day it is recognized as authority wherever the English language is spoken; and has been adopted as a standard in the public schools of St. Louis, Mo., and many other of the large American cities and towns, in preference to all other dictionaries and encyclopædias. More than 50,000 sets have found their way into public and private libraries, schools and homes during the past twelve months; and there is hardly a village or hamlet in America to which the fame of the Encyclopædic Dictionary has not spread. Such splendid and speedy results could have proceeded from nothing short of surperlative excellence.

This new work is at once a dictionary and an encyclopædia. It has all the utility of a superior "unabridged" and all the practical usefulness of a 25-volume encyclopædia without its diffuseness. Not only does it spell and define all the words in the English vocabulary, including the many thousands that have been added to our language during the past decade and are not to be found in other lexicons, but it treats some 50,000 subjects encyclopædically—and these subjects embrace nearly every branch of human knowledge. The Scientific American recently said: "The Encyclopædic Dictionary forms in itself a library for the busy man of affairs, the mechanic ambitious to advance himself in his line, or the student or apprentice just making a beginning." Equally is it adapted for the farmer the housewife, the teacher, lawyer or clergyman—in short for anyone who desires to keep pace with the march of progress, and to attain a higher degree of knowledge in any department.

Edited by such famous scientists and lexicographers as Dr. Robert Hunter, Professor Thomas Huxley, Professor Richard A. Proctor, Professor Charles Morris, and a hundred collaborators of scarcely less fame, the Encyclopædic Dictionary has been received with open arms by the literary and educational world; it has been unconditionally endorsed by thousands upon thousands of prominent scholars and educators, and by the leading newspapers and magazines. In less than one year it has pushed its way to the very highest rank in the realm of literature, where, in the language of the erudite Rev. Dr. Crane of Boston, "it holds a place of its own, unsurpassed and scarcely surpassable"—a work of unrivalled utility, equal to a college education, the grandest home reference library in existence.

A matter of importance to the public is the fact that the Syndicate Publishing Company, publishers of The Encyclopædic Dictionary, with a degree of combined shrewdness and liberality seldom observed, is just now offering this grand dictionary and encyclopædia of knowledge at wonderfully low prices and on almost ridiculously easy terms, as will appear from their announcement in this issue. Every family in America can, for a limited time, secure a copy of this indispensable home educator upon payments amounting to only seven cents a day. This liberal proposition, which holds good for only a few weeks longer, is a practical move in the direction of a wider education of the masses and is receiving the warmest endorsement of the public. Under these circumstances it is not surprising to learn that, under the remarkable [illegible] demand for the Encyclopædic Dictionary [illegible] a week and is still increasing. It is by no means improbable that [illegible] will be required to meet the demand arising from the recent extension of this special offer until Christmas Eve, at which [illegible] will be withdrawn and prices restored to the regular rates. No more appropriate and sensible holiday gift could be imagined, and it is certain that thousands of sets will be used for that purpose.

The people of America no less than the Syndicate Company, are to be congratulated upon the happy [illegible] the former [illegible] the grand opportunity afforded to secure a work of almost priceless educational value at a merely nominal cost, and the latter because a sharp campaign of only a few months has placed their [illegible] necessary publication [illegible] and established, by merit, as one of the few standard reference books of the world.

A Wonderful Offer

...TO...

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS!

POSITIVELY LIMITED TO DECEMBER 24th.

Never again will there be another Special Offer made on this great Standard Dictionary and Encyclopædia of the World's Knowledge. It is fully intended to advance the price on October 31st, but thousands of people in all walks of life have requested an extension of time until Christmas. After careful consideration, we have decided to continue this Special offer until the above date. This is done simply and only as a means of advertising the wonderful storehouse of information. We do not expect to make money by this offer, as the very low price on extremely liberal times little more than pays for paper, printing and binding; but the tremendous amount of talk created will help to advertise this most modern and up-to-date home reference library. No advertisement can do the work justice; it is its own most eloquent advocate. Recently adopted by the schools of St. Louis, Mo., and many other cities in preference to all other dictionaries and encyclopædias. It is equal to a college education.

FOR A CHRISTMAS GIFT NOTHING COULD BE BETTER.

Your pastor, teacher, friend, parents, or your children will appreciate this great work beyond expression. It will last a life time and always give satisfaction. No business or professional man, teacher, student, mechanic, housewife or any other person who wishes to keep abreast of the times, or who is interested in the laudable enterprise of self-education, can afford to allow this rare opportunity to pass without careful investigation. Understand, this great work embodies all the features of a complete Dictionary and a thorough Encyclopædia. The new and entirely up-to-the-times is now offered all readers of this paper at the rate of 7c. per day, in monthly payments of $2.00 each, until the sum of $16.00 is paid. This is but little more than one-third the regular price.

THIS GREATEST OF ALL DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPÆDIAS

is the joint production of such world-renowned scholars and lexicographers as DR. ROBERT HUNTER, A.M., F.G.S., probably England's foremost editor; PROF. CHAS. MORRIS, of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences; PROF. THOS. HUXLEY, the most eminent zoologist and biologist of the century; PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR, the famous astronomer; PROFS. WALKER and HARKNESS, the noted chemists and analysts; SIR JOHN STAINER, the acknowledged master of musical history and criticism; PROF. A. ESTOCLET, undoubtedly the greatest etymologist of the age; and scores of other leading specialists in all the various branches of science and mechanics, theology, law, commerce, agriculture, etc. Under the direction of these eminent men, the weary pages of prosy encyclopædias have been condensed into terse but comprehensive sentences, embodying the concentrated wisdom of centuries, and the very latest results of human skill—knowledge and discovery.

Thousands of readers of The Christian Herald are already the possessors of this grand HOME REFERENCE LIBRARY, secured on terms so easy, that no pecuniary inconvenience has been felt by them. YOU may enjoy the same privilege if you act NOW. You take no risk, for we will cheerfully refund your money if books are not as represented and are returned within ten days. BUT THEY DON'T COME BACK! Mr. William Chapman, Warren, Mass., writes us: "I have no hesitation in saying that it is the best investment of my life." Thousands more like him.

Over $750,000 required to produce this magnificent self-educator.

It is a Complete Dictionary of the English language. Every word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, etymology, pronunciation and various meanings.

It is a Thorough Encyclopædia of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, agriculture, physics, philosophy, mechanics, history, mythology, biblical knowledge, etc.

It is a Superb Library Book, substantially bound, printed from new plates, in large, clear type, on heavy white paper, and illustrated with thousands of new pictures made especially for this work.

It is better than all other dictionaries, because it contains nearly twice as many words as are found in any of the "Unabridged" Editions, and 25,000 to 50,000 more vocabulary terms as are contained in any other dictionary ever published in the English language. It treats of twice as many encyclopædic subjects as are covered by the largest of encyclopædias.

This great ENCYCLOPÆDIC DICTIONARY contains 5,357 pages, 250,000 vocabulary terms, 50,000 encyclopædic topics, 3,000 illustrations, and is bound in four massive quarto volumes, each 9½ inches wide, 11½ inches long, 3 inches thick.

Twelve Opinions--Thousands More Equally Good.

The Encyclopædic Dictionaries ordered some weeks ago for use in the public schools of St. Louis, are giving excellent satisfaction. After an exhaustive examination of all the leading dictionaries, yours was selected in preference to any other. The Committee thought your book best adapted to our use, and we have had no reason to modify that opinion. As an unabridged dictionary your work leaves nothing to be desired; and the profusion of encyclopædic matter, terse, yet comprehensive, covering thousands of important topics, saves many a long search through the more cumbersome encyclopædias.—Elmer E. Lacey, Chairman Course of Study Com., St. Louis Board of Education

The most valuable work of reference in our library. Its encyclopædic character is such that we now seldom refer to the large and cumbersome encyclopædias.—Prof. C. A. Leonard, A.M., Principal of Schools, Cynthiana, Ky.

Serves the purpose of a complete reference library. Christian Herald, New York.

A marvel of condensation—a boon to every student.—Rev. Oliver Crane, D.D., LL.D., Boston.

In all respects a work that every student and home should possess.—Hon. Geo. T. Werts, Governor of New Jersey.

My use of the Encyclopædic Dictionary has been eminently satisfactory. I have never consulted it to be disappointed.—Rev. Thos. S. Childs, D.D., Washington, D. C.

It forms a perfect treasury of knowledge and serves the purposes of an encyclopædia as well as a dictionary. I enclose P. O. Order for five more sets.—Rev. George Patterson, D.D., New Glasgow, Nova Scotia.

It is the greatest time-saver among all my books of reference. There is no other work of many times its size and cost that can for a moment compare with it.—Rev. S. W. Miller, D.D., Saltsburg, Pa.

Extensive in information, unimpeachable in accuracy.—Public Ledger, Philadelphia.

The Encyclopædic Dictionary is, in the fullest sense, up to modern ideas and demands.—New York Mail and Express.

We have here a dictionary far surpassing any other now before the public, combined with the fuller treatment usually reserved for the encyclopædia.—Illinois School Journal.

A very valuable work of reference. I know of no work that will exactly take its place.—Prof. W. E. Anderson, Supt. of Schools, Milwaukee, Wis.

Don't forget this special offer holds good only until Christmas Eve, at which time the price will be advanced from $42 to $70 per set, and absolutely no deviation from these prices will be made. It is not for sale in book stores, and can only be obtained from us or our authorized representatives.

AGENTS WANTED.

HOW TO GET THIS GREAT WORK.—Send $2 by post-office order, express order, or check, and the entire handsome volumes will be forwarded. Every month thereafter send $2, in the same manner, until the sum of $16 is paid. Understand whole set of four volumes is sent when the first $2 is paid, thus you have the use of them while paying the balance, at the rate of 7 cents per day. All freight or express charges must be paid by purchaser. Any one wishing to pay cash for the complete set, may deduct per cent., and send $14.40. This allowance is practically the cost of keeping the account if purchased on easy terms.

ACCEPTED AUTHORITY WHEREVER THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE IS SPOKEN.

If you wish to investigate further, send six cents to pay postage, etc., on sample book of specimen pages. If you want to save time, send at once, with last payment or cash in full at your option. We refer to Dun or Bradstreet, or to any bank in Philadelphia, as to our standing and responsibility. THE DISABLED.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: I. Sam. 30: 24, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

IF you have never seen an army change quarters, you have no idea of the amount of baggage—twenty loads, fifty loads, a hundred loads of baggage. David and his army were about to start on a double-quick march for the recovery of their captured families from the Amalekites. So they left by the brook Besor their blankets, their knapsacks, their baggage, and their carriages. Who shall be detailed to watch this stuff? There are sick soldiers, and wounded soldiers, and aged soldiers who are not able to go on swift military expedition, but who are able to do some work, and so they are detailed to watch the baggage. There is many a soldier who is not strong enough to march thirty miles in a day and then plunge into a ten hours' fight, who is able with drawn sword lifted against his shoulder to pace up and down as a sentinel to keep off an enemy who might put the torch to the baggage. There are two hundred of those crippled and aged and wounded soldiers detailed to watch the baggage. Some of them, I suppose, had bandages across the brow, and some of them had their arm in a sling, and some of them walked on crutches. They were not cowards shirking duty. They had fought in many a fierce battle for their country and their God. They are now part of the time in hospital, and part of the time on garrison duty. They almost cry because they cannot go with the other troops to the front. While these sentinels watch the baggage, the Lord watches the sentinels.

There is quite a different scene being enacted in the distance. The Amalekites, having ravaged and ransacked and robbed whole countries, are celebrating their success in a roaring carousal. Some of them are dancing on the lawn with wonderful gyration of heel and toe, and some of them are examining the spoils of victory—the finger-rings and ear-rings, the necklaces, the wristlets, the headbands, diamond starred, and the coffers with coronets, and carnelians, and pearls, and sapphires, and emeralds, and all the wealth of plate, and jewels, and decanters, and the silver and the gold banked up on the earth in princely profusion, and the embroideries, and the robes, and the turbans, and the cloaks of an imperial wardrobe. The banquet has gone on until the banqueters are maudlin and weak and stupid and indecent and loathsomely drunk. What a time it is now for David and his men to swoop on them. So the English lost the battle of Bannockburn, because the night before they were in wassail and bibulous celebration, while the Scotch were in prayer. So the Syrians were overthrown in their carousal by the Israelites. So Chedorlaomer and his army were overthrown in their carousal by Abraham and his men. So, in our Civil War, more than once the battle was [illegible] of the generals was drunk. Now is the time for David and his men to swoop upon these carousing Amalekites. Some of the Amalekites are hacked to pieces on the spot, some of them are just able to go staggering and hiccoughing off the field, some of them crawl on camels and speed off in the distance. David and his men gather together the wardrobes, the jewels, and put them upon the back of camels, and into wagons, and they gather together the sheep and cattle that had been stolen, and start back toward the garrison. Yonder they come, yonder they come. The limping men of the garrison come out and greet them with wild huzza. The Bible says David saluted them. That is, he asked them how they all were. "How is your broken arm?" "How is your fractured jaw?" "Has the stiffened limb been unlimbered?" "Have you had another chill?" "Are you getting better?" He saluted them.

But now came a very difficult thing, the distribution of the spoils of victory. Drive up those laden camels now. Who shall have the spoils? Well, some selfish soul suggests that these treasures ought all to belong to those who had been out in active service. "We did all the fighting while these men stayed at home in the garrison, and we ought to have all the treasures." But David looked into the worn faces of these veterans who had stayed in the garrison, and he looked around and saw how cleanly everything had been kept, and he saw that the baggage was all safe, and he knew that these wounded and crippled men would gladly enough have been at the front if they had been able, and the little general looks up from under his helmet and says: "No, no, let us have fair play;" and he rushes up to one of these men and he says, "Hold your hands together," and the hands are held together, and he fills them with silver. And he rushes up to another man who was sitting away back and had no idea of getting any of the spoils, and throws a Babylonish garment over him and fills his hand with gold. And he rushes up to another man who had lost all his property in serving God and his country years before, and he drives up some of the cattle and some of the sheep that they had brought back from the Amalekites, and he gives two or three of the cattle and three or four of the sheep to this poor man, so he shall always be fed and clothed. He sees a man so emaciated and worn out and sick he needs stimulants, and he gives him a little of the wine that he brought from the Amalekites. Yonder is a man who has no appetite for the rough rations of the army, and he gives him a rare morsel from the Amalekitish banquet, and the two hundred cripple and maimed and aged soldiers who tarried on garrison duty get just as much of the spoils of battle as any of the two hundred men that went to the front. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

The impression is abroad that the Christian rewards are for those who do conspicuous service in distinguished places—great patriots, great preachers, great philanthropists. But my text sets forth the idea that there is just as much reward for a man that stays at home and minds his own business, and who, crippled and unable to go forth and lead in great movements and in the high places of the earth, does his whole duty just where he is. Garrrison duty as important and as remunerative as service at the front. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

The Earl of Kintore said to me in an English railway, "Mr. Talmage, when you get back to America I want you to preach a sermon on the discharge of ordinary duty in ordinary places, and then send me a copy of it." Afterward an English clergyman coming to this land brought from the Earl of Kintore the same message! Alas! that before I got ready to do what he asked me to do, the good Earl of Kintore had departed this life. But that man, surrounded by all palatial surroundings, and in a distinguished sphere, felt sympathetic with those who had ordinary duties to perform in ordinary places and in ordinary ways. A great many people are discouraged when they hear the story of Moses, and of Joshua, and of David, and of Luther, and of John Knox, and of Deborah, and of Florence Nightingale. They say: "Oh, that was all good and right for them, but I shall never be called to receive the law on Mount Sinai, I shall never be called to command the sun and moon to stand still, I shall never be called to slay a giant, I shall never preach on Mars' Hill, I shall never defy the Diet of Worms, I shall never be called to make a queen tremble for her crimes, I shall never preside over a hospital." There are women who say, "If I had as brilliant a sphere as those people had, I should be as brave and as grand; but my business is to get children off to school and to hunt up things when they are lost, and to see that dinner is ready, and to keep account of the household expenses, and to hinder the children from being strangulated by the whooping cough, and to go through all the annoyances and vexations of housekeeping. Oh, my sphere is so infinitesimal, and so insignificant, I am clear discouraged." Woman, God places you on garrison duty, and your reward will be just as great as that of Florence Nightingale, who moving so often night by night with a light in her hand through the hospitals, was called by the wounded the "lady of the lamp." Your reward will be just as great as that of Mrs. Hertzog, who built and endowed theological seminary buildings. Your reward will be just as great as that of Hannah More, who by her excellent books won for her admirers Garrick and Edmund Burke and Joshua Reynolds. Rewards are not to be given according to the amount of noise you make in the world, nor even according to the amount of good you do, but according to whether you work to your full capacity, according to whether or not you do your full duty in the sphere where God has placed you.

Suppose you give to two of your children errands, and they are to go off to make purchases, and to one you give one dollar and to the other you give twenty dollars. Do you reward the boy that you gave twenty dollars to for purchasing more with that amount of money than the other boy purchased with one dollar? Of course not. If God give wealth or social position or eloquence or twenty times the faculty to a man that he gives to the ordinary man, is he going to give to the favored man a reward because he has more power and more influence? Oh, no. In other words, if you and I were to do our whole duty, and you have twenty times more talent than I have, you will get no more divine reward than I will. Is God going to reward you because he gave you more? That would not be fair, that would not be right. These two hundred men of the text who fainted by the brook Besor did their whole duty; they watched the baggage, they took care of the stuff, and they got as much of the spoils of victory as the men who went to the front. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

There is high encouragement in this [illegible] all who have great responsibility and little credit for what they do. You know the names of the great commercial houses of these cities. Do you know the names of the confidential clerks—the men who have the key to the safe, the men who know the combination-lock? A distinguished merchant goes forth at the summer watering-place, and he flashes past, and you say: "Who is that?" "Oh," replies one, "don't you know? That is the great importer, that is the great banker, that is the great manufacturer." The confidential clerk has his week off. Nobody notices whether he comes or goes. Nobody knows him, and after awhile his work is done, and he sits down again at his desk. But God will reward his fidelity just as much as he recognizes the work of the merchant philanthropist whose investments this unknown clerk so carefully guarded. Hudson River Railroad, Pennsylvania Railroad, Erie Railroad, New York and New Haven Railroad—business men know the names of the presidents of these roads and of the prominent directors: but they do not know the names of the engineers, the names of the switchmen, the names of the flagmen, the names of the brakemen. These men have awful responsibilities, and sometimes, through the recklessness of an engineer, or the unfaithfulness of a switchman, it has brought to mind the faithfulness of nearly all the rest of them. Some men do not have recognition of their services. They have small wages, and much complaint. I very often ride upon locomotives, and I very often ask the question, as we shoot around some curve, or under some ledge of rocks, "How much wages do you get?" And I always surprised to find how little for such vast responsibility. Do you suppose God is not going to recognize that fidelity? Thomas Scott, the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, going up at death to receive from God his destiny, was no better known in that hour than was known last night the brakeman who, on the Erie Railroad was jammed to death amid the car couplings. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

Once for thirty-six hours we expected every moment to go to the bottom of the ocean. The waves struck through the skylights, and rushed down into the hold of the ship, and hissed against the boilers. It was an awful time; but by the blessing of God, and the faithfulness of the engineer in charge, we came out of the cyclone, and we arrived at home. Each one before leaving the ship thanked Captain Andrews. I do not think there was a man or woman that went off that ship without thanking Captain Andrews, and when, years after, I heard of his death, I was impelled to write a letter of condolence to his family in Liverpool. Everybody recognized the goodness, the courage, the kindness of Captain Andrews; but it occurs to me now that we never thanked the engineer. He stood away down in the darkness, amid the hissing furnaces, doing his whole duty. Nobody thanked the engineer, but God recognized his heroism and his continuance and his fidelity, and there will be just as high reward for the engineer who worked out of sight, as for Captain, who stood on the bridge of the ship in the midst of the howling tempest. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

A Christian woman was seen going along the edge of a wood, every evening, and the neighbors in the country did not understand how a mother with so many cares and anxieties should waste so much time as to be idly sauntering out every evening by evening. It was found out afterward she went there to pray for her household, and while there one evening, she wrote that beautiful hymn, famous in all ages for cheering Christian hearts:

I love to steal awhile away
From every cumbering care,

Sll there be no reward for such unpreteling, yet everlasting, service?

here is high encouragement in this subje, also, for those who once wrought htily for Christ and the Church, but tough sickness or collapse of fortune or anced years, cannot now go to the fnt. These two hundred men of the text we veterans. Let that man bare his arm a show how the muscles were torn. Let h pull aside the turban and see the rk of a battle-axe. Pull aside the coat a see where the spear thrust him. Vuld it have been fair for those men, cipled, weak, and old, by the brook Bes to have no share in the spoils of trioph? I was in the Soldiers' Hospital in Pis, and I saw there men of the first Naaleon. Some of them were lame, they we all aged. Did the French Governmt turn off those old soldiers to die in wt? No; their last days were spent li princes. Do you think my Lord is goi to turn off his old soldiers because they a weak and worn and because they fted by the brook Besor? Are they gg to get no part of the spoils of the vory? Just look at them. Do you tk those crevices in the face are wrinks? No; they are battle scars. They fght against sickness, they fought against tble, they fought against sin, they fght for God, they fought for the Church, ty fought for the truth, they fought for Hven. When they had plenty of money tr names were always on the subscripti list. When there was any hard work tpe done for God, they were ready to tle the heaviest part of it. When there che a great revival, they were ready to py all night for the anxious and the sinsick. They were ready to do any work, e ure any sacrifice, do the most unpopuli thing that God demanded of them. E now they cannot go further. Now ty have physical infirmities. Now their Id troubles them. They are weak and ft by the brook Besor. Are they to Pe no share in the triumph? Are they tget none of the treasures, none of the s ils of conquest? You must think that Crist has a very short memory if you tk he has forgotten their services.

Fret not, ye aged ones. Just tarry by t stuff and wait for your share of the s ils. They are coming. It makes me lgh to think how you will be surprised Ven they tell you to go in and dine th the king. I see you backing out bese you feel unworthy. The shining es come up on the one side, and the sning ones come up on the other side, al they push you on and they push you t and they say, "Here is an old soldier f Jesus Christ," and the shining ones gl rush out toward you and say, "Yes, ft man saved my soul;" or they will sh out and say, "Oh, yes, she was with t in the last sickness." And then the e will go round the circle, "Come in, ne in, come in, come up; we saw you ay down there, old and sick and despit and discouraged because you could t go to the front, but 'As his part is that eth down to the battle, so shall his part that tarrieth by the stuff.'"

There is high consolation, also, in this aged ministers. I see some of them re to-day. They sit in pews in our urches. They used to stand in pulpits. eir hair is white with the blossoms of e tree of life. Their names marked on e roll of the General Assembly, or of the ssociation, "Emeritus." They sometimes ar a text announced which brings to mind sermon they preached fifty years ago on e same subject. They preached more spel on $400 a year than some of their ccessors preach on $4,000. Some Sunday e old minister is in a church, and near in another pew there is a husband d a wife and a row of children. And ter the benediction, the lady comes up id says, "Doctor, you don't know me, you?" "Well," he says, "your face familiar, but I cannot call you by name." Why," she says, "you baptized me id you married me and you buried my father and mother and sisters." "Oh, yes," he says, "my eyesight isn't as good as it used to be." They are in all our churches—the heroes of 1820, the heroes of 1832, the heroes of 1857. By the long grave trench that cut through half a century, they have stood sounding the resurrection. They have been in more Balaklavas and have taken more Sebastopols than you ever heard of. Sometimes they get a little fretful because they cannot be at the front. They hear the sound of the battle and the old war-horse champs his bit. But the 60,000 ministers of religion, this day standing in the brunt of the fray, shall have no more reward than those retired veterans. "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

Cheer up, men and women of unappreciated services. You will get your reward, if not here, hereafter. When Charles Wesley comes up to judgment, and the thousands of souls which were wafted into glory through his songs shall be enumerated, he will take his throne. Then John Wesley will come up to judgment, and after his name has been mentioned in connection with the salvation of the millions of souls brought to God through the Methodism which he founded, he will take his throne. But between the two thrones of Charles Wesley and John Wesley, there will be a throne higher than either, on which shall sit Susannah Wesley, who with maternal consecration in Epworth Rectory, Lincolnshire, started those two souls on their triumphant mission of sermon and song through all following ages. Oh, what a day that will be for many who rocked Christian cradles with weary foot, and who patched worn-out garments and darned socks, and out of a small income made the children comfortable for the winter. What a day that will be for those to whom the world gave the cold shoulder, and called them nobodies, and begrudged them the least recognition, and who, weary and worn and sick, fainted by the brook Besor. Oh, that will be a mighty day when the Son of David shall distribute among them the garlands, the crowns, the sceptres, the chariots, the thrones. And then it shall be found out that all who on earth served God in inconspicuous spheres, receive just as much reward as those who filled the earth with uproar of achievement. Then they shall understand the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the pillared and domed magnificence of my text, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

"THE POMEGRANATE SELLER."

First of the Colored Illustrations to be Produced in "The Christian Herald"—A Familiar Eastern Scene.

IN presenting the magnificent colored illustration on the first page, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may be regarded as the inaugurator of a new departure in religious journalism. It was explained last week, in announcing the proposed change, that there was no reason why secular papers should monopolize one of the most attractive features in modern journalism, and that the proprietor of this journal believed that if there is any power for good in color-printing, the Lord's cause should have the benefit of it. Acting in accordance with that conviction, colored illustrations will from this time henceforth be a prominent and, we believe, a highly appreciated feature of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Our initial color-picture deals with the market-place of Jaffa the principal seaport of Palestine. With the history of Jaffa, every Bible-reader is more or less familiar. It was the port of Jerusalem in King Solomon's days; it was the home of Simon the Tanner, where Peter the Apostle was visiting when he had his remarkable vision, and it was the home of that Dorcas, whose abundant charities made the poor speak her name with loving reverence and tears. Jaffa has had a famous history of conquest and defeat, opulence and impoverishment. To-day it is little more than a village, the remnant of a once great and powerful city.

ORANGE-SELLERS IN THE JAFFA MARKET.

By far the most interesting sight in Jaffa is the public market-place, or general bazar, which is held outside the town. Since the opening of the railway between Jaffa and Jerusalem, the volume of business at the bazar has increased considerably, but the general aspect of the great square where the market is held, is probably little changed in centuries. This square encloses a considerable part of the town front, and on market days the tradesmen of Jaffa and the people of the surrounding country for miles, may be found there personally attending to the sale of their goods. First in importance come the natives of Jaffa, with their different articles, consisting of new and second-hand pieces of cloth, calico and all sorts of provisions, including many varieties of fruits. These they sell to the peasants and strangers, who flock to the bazar in crowds, with camels, mules and donkeys laden with charcoal, grain, straw, etc., which they in turn sell to the natives of Jaffa. These peasants come from villages from one to six hours distant, to sell and to buy at the Jaffa market. The market is an open-air one, and the natives protect themselves from the burning sun by little tents, made very roughly of old pieces of canvas, or by small huts constructed of reeds, and just big enough to hold the articles for sale, while the peasant vendors must stand, or sit down on the ground. Sometimes the extreme heat is almost unendurable.

Walking around the bazar, one can see, here and there, a man standing beside a camel which carries a load of charcoal, awaiting a customer; next to him, possibly, is one with a camel or donkey-load of straw, and it may be a third one, with a load of wood. Over yonder is a large heap of wheat, barley, lentiles, or other grain for sale. There are many stalls and baskets heaped with oranges, pomegranates or other fruit, and some with bundles of sugar-cane. Frugal to the last degree, the peasant women of Palestine are careful to save such marketable stuff as chickens, eggs, chaff, tare and other things, that they may bring them for sale to Jaffa market. Sometimes a woman takes the trouble to walk three or four hours' distance to market with half a dozen eggs—only two cents' worth; sometimes with a chicken worth six or eight cents, a bundle of wood for three or four cents, or a small quantity of tare or chaff, that is worth only two cents. Although the transaction may seem to be insignificant, the peasant housekeeper can help herself considerably by such sales. The few cheap staples the peasants require from the cities or towns are, first, calico, of which three or four yards are quite sufficient to clothe a man or woman, two yards a boy or a girl, and a half yard for a baby; next, salt, two cents' worth of which will be sufficent for a week; then thread, olive-oil soap, and a few other little articles, which may be obtained after selling their own goods, as mentioned above.

There are few articles of real value exposed for sale at the Jaffa market. It is in reality only a small Oriental bazar, the general sight of which, however, is very interesting to a visitor who has seen nothing of the kind before.

The beautiful colored illustration on the first page of this issue, represents a scene familiar to all who have visited Jaffa. In a cool corner of the market, shaded by palms and also sheltered by canvas so frail that it threatens to fall in pieces, sit a group of fruit vendors. Before them are heaped-up baskets of oranges and pomegranates. To one dealer comes an Arab—a son of the desert—intent on making a purchase. There is more dickering and beating down of prices in an Oriental transaction than anywhere else in the world. The transaction has something of the character of a studied dialogue, in which the climax is reached when the seller consents to accept a price somewhere about the true value of the article. In the background, their outlines showing darkly against the limestone building beyond, stand two patient camels. The entire scene—the blue skies, the hot, yellow sands and sharp shadows, the peculiar, bright-hued robes of the figures in the foreground, together with the whole surrounding—is full of Oriental character and interest. Another interesting group, also from the Jaffa market, is shown in the photograph of the orange-sellers, on this page.

BOWERY MISSION PATRONS.

THE following persons have sent in their names for enrollment as Patrons of the Bowery Mission during the past week:

Mrs. Mary Prentice.

All desiring to be enrolled on the list of patrons of the Bowery Mission should send their names and addresses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

SAUL REJECTED.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 17. I. Sam. 15 : 10-23. Golden Text I. Sam. 15: 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALREADY Saul had failed through unbelief, and Samuel had come to him with the message from the Lord; "Thou hast done foolishly; thou has not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God which he commanded thee: for now would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel forever. But now thy kingdom shall not continue: the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee." His dynasty should not last, and yet God permitted Saul to have much success against the enemies of Israel. (chap. 14: 47, 48.) But Saul was not true to his God. It is only in time of testing that real consecration, and real love to God come out, or the proof shows that we lack these things. Samuel was always ready to stand at Saul's side, and give him help from God, but generally Saul was self-sufficient, and did not value the precious privilege of the prophet's help.

But now Samuel came unsought to the king with a message from the Lord: "The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now thou unto the voice of the words of the Lord." The mark of true anointing is to know how to hearken and to recognize the voice of God. The anointed prophet whose ear was always open to God, says to the self-willed king: "Hearken! . . . Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way when he came up from Egypt- Now go and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass." It was an opportunity and a test. An opportunity for Saul to retrieve his character as God's representative who should reign for him and carry out his purposes, acting under his directions; and it was at the same time a test as to whether he could so far obey God that, even though his dynasty should not last, he might personally be trusted with the kingdom during his life. There was also a solemn lesson for Saul to learn. Some hundreds of years had elapsed since God had declared to Moses and charged him to write it in a book "I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven." (Exod. 17: 14.) God had not forgotten; he had only waited until the measure of the sin of Amalek was full. He had also spoken solemn words about Saul's kingdom, and Saul must learn that God keeps his word.

Saul gathered this army, and after warning the Kenites to depart from the Amalekites, he proceeded with the work of extermination. The command of God was definite in the extreme: "utterly destroy;" but the king, instead of implicitly obeying, improved, as he thought, upon the command of God; destroyed the people, but spared the king; destroyed all that was vile and refuse among their sheep and cattle, but spared "the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings and of the lambs and all that was good. There is a terrible lack of true manliness in the man who thinks to improve upon the Word of the living God. It is in which we live that men speak and act as though they knew better than the God who made them; and the fearful attempt to get rid of the inspiration, and therefore the authority of God's Word is achieving a success which is a sign of the ripening of the world for the time of Antichrist. God said, utterly destroy, for he could not accept or utilize that which he had cursed. Self, the flesh, often appears in lovely forms; noble, courageous, pleasing, intelligent, and yet when it reaches its brightest goal, it will bring forth nothing better than "the man of sin." (II. Thes. 2: 3.) God gives it no other place than on the Cross of Christ. They that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts." (Gal. 5: 24.) Human reason and human pride, clamor for the recognition of what is good in human nature, and the men of this age count it narrow-minded and absurd to regard as real the words of Paul written by the Holy Ghost's inspiration, "In me that is, in my flesh, dwelleth

No Good Thing."

(Rom. 7: 18.) Man sees no shame in the self-glory and self-seeking of the flesh, but justifies it, and says, "God made me so," utterly ignoring the fall and the fact that man was first created in the image of God; and as utterly ignoring the greater fact still, that his purpose is unchanged for those who enter into it; to conform them to the image of his Son, and even to make them "partakers of the divine nature." (Rom. 8: 29; II. Pet. 1: 4.) Saul is a typical man living after the flesh. His name, which signifies Hades, the place of the departed, is no accident; spiritually there was more of death than life in him. God did his part; he drew him, gave him another heart, even gave him the tongue which prophesied by the Spirit. But Saul did not do his part, he did not yield himself up to God as a living sacrifice, and thus his life became a failure.

Samuel, rejected by man, was still at home in God's counsel, and he made known to him the defection of the king, and said, "It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king." And Samuel, far from entertaining a feeling of satisfaction that his misgivings and warnings about setting up a king were justified, gave himself to prayer for the erring king, and "cried to the Lord all night." Thus fortified by communion with his God, Samuel came to Saul, and instead of finding him heart-broken for his disobedience, he found him exulting! Oh how the words must have grated on the prophet's ear, after his God and he had passed such a night together: "Blessed be thou of the Lord; I have performed the commandment of the Lord," as though to seek credit from the prophet for his victory! Little indeed was he prepared for the rejoinder: "What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear." There was no denying the fact that the Amalekitish sheep and oxen were alive, which had been by the command of Jehovah destined to utter destruction.

Child of the living God who reads these words—is there in your heart or life, some Agag, which you keep alive to serve the purpose of your pride and self-glory? Saul was true to his people's desire, he acted "like the nation," and preserved Agag to lead him captive in chains that he might grace his triumph. Are you holding to anything in which the world appreciates you? Are you one who loves the praise of men more than the praise of God? It is a terrible thing to preserve in our brittle chains anything that God has doomed to death. Saul made answer. A man who lives in true relation to God never makes excuse, he wants to know where he is wrong that he may be put right. The miserable, unkingly king sought to make himself out to be in the right when he had every proof that he was in the wrong, and instead of acknowledging his fault as David did his, he cast the blame upon his people. Oh the meanness of the human heart when self is its centre! When at last the king was forced to admit his sin, he only confessed it from a selfish motive, in order that he might keep up appearances. The true anointing, the true kingly dignity was lacking.

Saul had been tried in the balances and found wanting. When he brought a pious excuse and said, "The people took of the spoil sheep and oxen, . . . to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God in Gilgal." Samuel replied: "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." No amount of zeal can make up for disobedience to the revealed will of God. In our days an immense amount of work goes under the the name of religious work, but how much of it is done in the spirit of obedience and of self-sacrifice and of humility? The die was cast; Saul was put to the proof; it was his last chance.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

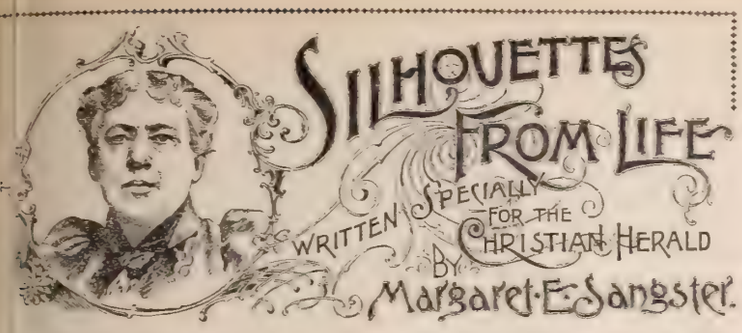
NEAR GILGAL.

OBEDIENCE is the supreme test of character in the eyes of God. That is the essence of the lesson. Saul failed when it was applied to him. The events of his reign, as recorded in the chapters intervening between that describing his inauguration and the one to be considered this week, give a clear idea of his character. Humble and diffident at first, he becomes impulsive, arrogant, and imperious as he grows accustomed to his position. It was not a position of ease and luxury. Barely had he assumed his duties, than he was called up on to defend a town against the king of the Ammonites, who proposed not only to enslave the people, to which they consented, but to put out their right eyes. Saul attacked the cruel barbarian, and routed him so decisively that the land rang with his praises, and the people were ready to kill any man who would not recognize him as king. A great assembly was called at Gilgal to solemnly proclaim him king over all Israel. Samuel took advantage of the occasion to formally resign his power and to caution the people about their future behaviour. Saul, being now secure in his throne, collected a small army of three thousand picked men and prepared himself to defend his kingdom. The first attack came from the Philistines, which was a much more serious danger than the attack of the Ammonites. But Israel was again victorious, this time through the valor of Jonathan, Saul's son. Saul's conduct in the crisis caused his first breach with Samuel. He had an appointment with the prophet, who was to come and offer sacrifice before the battle. But Saul grew impatient before Samuel's arrival, and offered the sacrifice himself, thereby slighting the prophet and showing his lack of faith in God's guidance. Samuel solemnly denounced him, and warned him that he no longer enjoyed God's favor. But he was not immediately deposed. God does not always execute judgment at once; and that is why people are apt to think he is not so angry at sin as he really is. Another opportunity for service was granted Saul. The Amalekites, a predatory tribe who wandered around in the desert south of Palestine, had harassed Israel during the forty years' wandering, and had fought one pitched battle with them at Rephidim (Ex. 17: 8-13). They were now to be destroyed. Moses had enjoined it as a duty (Deut. 25: 17-19), and it was probably essential to the peace and safety of the nation. They were impious, treacherous, and inhuman. The order for their utter extermination went forth, and Saul was commissioned to execute it. He gathered his army fought against the enemy, and again wo a decisive victory. It was in the hour his triumph that he made the final breac with God and with Samuel. He kept son of the cattle, in which the Amalekites we rich, as a prey, thereby robbing the ca paign of its character as a commission divine vengeance, and making it a me looting expedition, which was of no bene as an example to the other nations. Sa also kept the Agag, or king, of the Ama kites alive, probably to grace his triumj on his return. Whatever his motive m have been, he disobeyed, and Samuel nounced him and parted from him, nev to see him again.

It repenteth me. God uses words, his communications with men, which adapted to their understanding. In t instance he simply meant that he wou not go on to bless and prosper Saul as would have done had Saul been obedie To repent is literally to turn again a take a different course. A man sho true repentance by quitting his sins a striving to live a life of holiness, m than he does by weeping and lamenti "I have no confidence in him," saic banker to a friend, who was urging him promote his nephew to a place of trust the bank. The nephew was one of clerks in the bank, who had not access the money, but simply posted up the le ers. But a teller's place was vacant, the young man's uncle visited his fri the banker to plead for his nephew. banker's reply hurt his friend, and asked with some warmth, "Why, has ever been unfaithful?" "No," said banker, "but he is not a young man t I feel safe in trusting. However, I not act on prejudice. Since you urge he shall have the position, and if he pr trustworthy he shall have still hig promotion." The uncle thanked friend and left him. Not more tha year afterward the two men were ag together, and the uncle was paying ov large sum of money and pleading w the banker not to prosecute his nephew embezzlement. "It is a pity I yielde you," said the banker. "The young was not strong enough to resist the te tations incidental to the position. It wo have been better for all concerned to h left him to the books, where there was temptation. I am sorry." The bar deplored this young man's fall as deplored the fall of Saul.

To obey is better than sacrifice. The st is told of a wealthy brewer who rente a large number of saloons in a certain t where the payment for licenses were voted to the support of schools and houses. The men who nominally held houses were simply the brewer's repre tatives. He took the larger part of proceeds of the traffic. His eldest son came a Christian and he protested to father against his business. "See he said the brewer, "look at this book. are my subscriptions to churches and ities. I give away more than a tent of my income. I know the trade is bad, some one must be in it, and it is better I should have it and do good with proceeds than let it go into the hand men who would give nothing. Bes this, the licenses go to good causes If there were no drink or drunkards, churches and charities would suffer." all this the son made no reply but, obey is better than sacrifice." His fath special pleading could not convince that it was right to do evil that good m come. He renounced his expectation inheritance, began life as a poor man, is now trying to redeem the drunk who are ruining themselves with the d his father makes and sells.

He hath rejected thee. In a cheap lod house in Chicago a missionary ent into conversation with an elderly whose wretched appearance was in s contrast to his manner and conv tion which were those of an educated, tured man. The missionary won his fidence, and after listening to a sto crime, he said, "You do not look as if had prospered by your wickedness." man shook his head. He said, "I not prospered at it. With half the and energy I have spent, I might made a fortune; but now I am home twice I have been in State's prison. I made acquaintance with every descri of misery; but I tell you my worst ishment is being what I am."



A HEROINE.

I SAW her walking down the street in the rain, a big, clumsy woman in a rusty black alpaca dress, and a plain, woolen shawl. She carried an unwieldy bundle and plodded on as if she were tire My friend said, looking out of the window, "There goes Mrs. Phœbe Jane Smith. She's a heroine, the pluckiest, bravest woman I ever saw."

"She looks as though she was desperate poor," I said, pityingly. "What is the bundle, pray?"

"Coats which she has finished, and is taking home to the tailors? She has tried other work, dress-making, I believe; even embroidery and plain sewing have been among the things she has done, and she has one out nursing and taken in laundry work, but at present she finds the coats paying best. She has a sick daughter, her son died last year, and she has a cripple grandson in the house. For them all Phœbe Jane is the sole bread-winner."

"But surely her husband is living still, and she's a gentleman born and bred. He studied law—why, it all comes back to me now—he had a good practice, and was a tall, fine-looking fellow, dark-eyed and with distinguished manner. And Mrs. Smith used to teach school, she was a pretty graceful girl, not in the least like this person. Perhaps though, she died, and his is the second wife."

"I think, in a way, she did die, and this is the second wife." my friend replied, "but I do not mean what you do. When truth and pride and hope and love die and the woman simply holds on to duty and to her place in life, with grim, stubborn courage—she becomes another woman. Hard work and sorrow have robbed Mrs. Smith of her beauty, but she is a splendid creature, and I admire her for the loyal way in which she sticks to Horace, notwithstanding his inebriety. That is the trouble—drink—the poor fellow comes of a long line of roystering forefathers, and he hasn't the physique they had, and then, too, the moral fibre in him has been slackened; very likely he cannot help being a drunkard."

"Don't say that Louise!" I exclaimed hotly. "With God's help, any man can help being a drunkard. I believe in people seeing saved by the grace of God. But tell me more about the Smyths; they interest me. This woman, you say, loves her husband still."

"I don't know about love. I can't imagine her loving him in just the same way, but there is a love of pity, and some wives have a sort of heavenly tenderness which outlives everything else on earth. They went down very slowly at first, then faster, the down grade is generally an easy one at the last.

"Horace lost his law practice as soon as his clients found that his judgment was not to lean on. Then his Uncle James set him up in a stationery store, a nice stock of paper, envelopes, pencils, pens, books and bric-a-brac, and, as such a shop was needed in our place, we hoped he would get on. Phœbe Jane worked in it early and late, but do all she could, every dollar they made went for liquor, and Horace would come into the shop in a fierce rage, and storm at her before customers, and frighten them, and the thing had to be given up.

"He has stripped the house again and again of everything he could pawn, he has turned their son out of doors on a bitterly cold night. I once saw him with my own eyes push her out at midnight, then lock the door, and standing inside, laugh with insane mirth. That night I took her in and she slept till morning on the couch in my parlor. All she said was that 'poor Horace had been over-worked, and was not himself, delirious in fact. No kinder man lived, when he was himself.' Nobody has ever seen her lift the veil from the sanctuary of her married life, no one has ever heard her speak of Horace Smyth except with respect and affection. I call that brave."

"Do you think he will ever reform?" I asked the question doubtingly, for alas! we Christians are great and sinful sceptics when it comes to reforming men, just as we are bitterly cold, cruel and unfeeling in our treatment of men who have reformed, always remembering their past, unlike him who blots out his people's transgressions, and says he will remember their iniquities no more.

"I am sure that Horace will be a reformed man before he dies,' Louise answered firmly. "Lots of people are praying for him. He has taken to going to church and prayer-meeting, a good sign, and if he can be but truly converted, which may God grant, he will yet rise erect in new manhood, and trample the fetters of the old habit under his feet."

"Louise, you talk as if you faced an audience," I said, smiling. "I hope Mrs. Smyth is sustained by as intense a conviction."

"I think she is; I hope so," my friend replied. "There, she is coming back. I will ask her in for a cup of tea.'

Louise tapped on the pane. Mrs. Smyth, this time without the bundle, came in at the little gate, and with a cheerful smile lighting up her countenance, entered the parlor.

"I am so glad to give you a cup of our new tea; a missionary friend sent it to me from China," explained Louise. "Nothing rests one like a cup of hot tea. I cannot say that I care for it iced, myself."

We talked a little while over the respective merits of hot and cold tea, and then Mrs. Smyth said:

"I have good news, and I must tell it you; my husband has gained a position in the city, a position of trust, and I hope he will be able to do justice to his talents hereafter. He is perfectly well again, and I have given up, to-day, my work at Clark and Buttle's."

This was before me. When she went out, Louise accompanied her to the door, and there Mrs. Smyth broke down.

"Dear Horace has signed the pledge, and has united with the church, and I am the happiest woman this side heaven."

"From this day on," said Louise, returning to her cup of tea, and looking wistfully after her departing guest, "no day shall ever pass without my having a special season of prayer for the Smyths. She is a heroine, and he, I trust, a brand plucked from the burning."

EDUCATION IN JAPAN.

Education has made greater progress in Japan in the last 20 years than the outer world is aware of. In 1872 the Emperor announced his desire that there should thenceforward exist within his realm "not a village with an ignorant family, nor a family with an ignorant member." For the realization of this ideal a scheme of universal education was devised. It comprises the universally familiar Kindergarten, Board schools on the English model, American high schools, French normal schools, and a German university. The results of its working are striking, although not altogether admirable. Two million pupils attend the classes; illiteracy has become rare, "advanced thinkers" abound. The "classes" have settled down into virtual autheism; the "masses" tend to become more indifferent to the amalgam of Shintoism and Buddhism offered for their acceptance. Their interest is arrested by the novelty of material progress, and the religious life of the country is concentrated among close upon 100,000 Christians of all denominations. By the hot-headed Nationalist party, however, Christianity is regarded with aversion, as being "anti-Japanese," and the seeds of former intolerance, kept alive by the native press, are ready, under easily imaginable circumstances, to spring up and bear again the old bitter fruit. Japanese education is secular and compulsory, though not gratuitous. Its most marked result has been the development of a dangerous class of idle graduates, too learned to dig, too unsettled to trade, and hence always at hand for inflammatory purposes.

THE PRAYER ANSWERED.

FROM Mr. J. J. Coulthard, who is laboring as a missionary in China, comes a remarkable story of simple faith. He says: The bed of the Yellow River which is the principal river in the province of Ho-an, has for many years been gradually rising. The gradient through that province being slight, the yellow mud held in suspension by the rapid current of the rivers in the upper provinces is here deposited in the bed of the river. This has been going on for centuries and the bed is now higher than the surrounding country. The water would inundate the surrounding country if it were not kept from overflowing by embankments. When a breach is made in these, the waters pour down in torrents, and cause great devastation until the breach can be repaired. In 1887, such a disaster occurred, and for two years the officials, with their colossal army of workmen, vainly attempted to repair the break. The closer the ends of the embankment at either side of the breach were brought together, the stronger became the current, shaking the newly made banks to their foundations. Late in the Autumn of 1889, the native Christians at Chau-kia-k'eo decided to pray definitely for the closing of the breach. God answered the prayer, and honored the faith of the Christians.

One night, when the workmen were resting, an immense floe of ice floated down with the current, and, too large to pass through the breach, it lodged against it and effectually, though only temporarily, closed it. News of it was conveyed to the officials, all hands were aroused, and double pay offered to those who would work that night. Materials used for making embankments were brought with the utmost speed and while the ice floe held back the waters, the breach in the embankment was firmly built up. This answer to prayer has been to us a constant memorial of God's faithfulness. As breaches may occur at any time, farmers always have at hand a boat for removing their families to a safe place. To a traveller the sight of a boat so far from river or lake seems strange until he knows the reason."

BIBLE CONFIRMATION.

In an address recently given before the Church Conference at Norwich, England, Professor Sayce gave the details of a discovery which confirms a Bible narrative. He said: "Mr. Pinches, to whom Biblical and historical students are much indebted, has discovered a broken tablet in which Eri-Aku (the Arioch of Gen. 14: 1) is associated with two other princes, Kudur-Lagamar or Chedorlaomer the Elamite, and Tudkhal, the Tidal of Genesis. The proof of the historical accuracy of the narrative in the 14th chapter of Genesis is thus complete. But a discovery, still more important for establishing the truth and authenticity of the historical sources of Genesis has also lately been made by Mr. Pinches, who has allowed me to make it known for the first time on the present occasion. Before doing so, however, let me remind you that Arioch, or Eri-Aku, to whom I have just been alluding, was overthrown, along with his Elamite allies, by Khammurabi, the rival King of Babylon, and his kingdom annexed to that of his conqueror. Henceforth Babylonia, which had previously been divided into more than one kingdom, became a united monarchy, with Babylon as its capital. Now the names of the kings of the dynasty to which Khammurabi belonged are not Babylonian, or, as we generally term it, Assyrian, the words with which they are compounded not being found for the most part in that language. The Babylonians consequently found a difficulty in spelling them, and in the contract tablets which were drawn up at the time, the same name is written in different ways.

The names offer curious resemblances to Hebrew names. Among other names which remind us of those of the Old Testament Mr. Pinches has found in contract tablets dated in the reigns of Khammurabi and other kings of the dynasty the names of Yakub-ili and Yasup-ili, or Jacob-el and Joseph-el. The names are distinctively Hebrew, and prove that in the very century to which the Bible assigns the lifetime of Abraham, Hebrews with Hebrew names must have been living in Babylonia. The Egyptian monuments of the 18th and 19th dynasties mention places in Palestine called Jacob-el and Joseph-el, so that it has long been assumed that in the familiar Jacob and Joseph we must see an abreviation of Jacob-el and Joseph-el, and last year Professor Flinders Petrie actually found a scarab bearing the name of a Pharaoh, Jacob-el, who must have reigned over Egypt in the obscure period when it was ruled by Asiatic conquerors.

TIBET NEEDS THE GOSPEL.

In recent communications from Tibet, published by the London Christian, Miss Annie R. Taylor the well-known missionary describes something like an unusual event in the government of that country. She says:—There is interesting news from Lhassa; for the Dalai Lama, who is now nineteen years of age, has taken the reins of Government, and been proclaimed King of Tibet. He has had a dispute with the Chinese Amban, and told him that he is not the servant of the Emperor of China. This, of course, is evident, for the Emperor worships him as a god; and the Amban is, so it is said, in Lhassa, for the express purpose of protecting the Dalai Lama. The latter is always supposed to assume temporal as well as spiritual rule when he reaches the age of eighteen; but for over a hundred years no Dalai Lama has reached that age, having, as the Tibetans say, transmigated and been re-incarnated. The temporal government of Tibet has thus been entrusted to a Lama chief called Devashung, or King of Tibet, with a number of chiefs under him. This office is for the present done away with. For the sake of commercial interests, China keeps Tibet closed to Europeans; but we pray that the new move of the Dalai Lama may tend to the opening up of Tibet.

Life in Tibet is much easier than in Central Africa; one can get warm here, but in Africa one cannot get cool; and then it is healthy in Tibet. I enjoy very much the visiting among the people on the mountain side with their cattle. I am treating for an affection of the skin the mother of the deposed king of Sikkim; she has sent me as a present, a piece of Tibetan cloth. How good it would be to win her for Jesus! Quite a number of the people come to service on the Lord's day, as well as to see me on week days. Yet the country is still in darkness. Travellers from England, France and Russia go in amongst the people; are God's servants not content to live in huts, tents, or caves, and wander among the mountains? The Tibetans are more accessible than one may think, if God's servants will forego comforts, and wear the native dress.

A SONG OF CHEERFULNESS.

THE weary world's a cheery place
For those with hearts to win it:
Thank God, there's not a human face
But has some laughter in it!
The soul that comes with honest mirth,
Though health and fortune vary,
Brings back the childhood of the earth,
And keeps it sound and merry.

The plodding world's an eager place
For those with wit to use it;
Where all are bidden to the race
Let him who dare refuse it!
The simplest task the hand can try,
The dullest round of duty,
Knowledge can amply glorify,
And art can crown with beauty.

A busy, bonny, kindly place
Is this rough world of ours,
For those who love and work apace,
And fill their hands with flowers.
To kind and just and grateful hearts
The present grace is given
To find a heaven in themselves,
And find themselves in heaven!

MORE ARMENIAN MASSACRES.

Wholesale Slaughter at Trebizond, Baiburt and Erzinjan—The Unprecedented Distress—Turkey's Promises of Reform—Missionaries in Peril.

A NEW reign of terror has begun in Armenia. Unsatisfied by the butcheries of Sassoun, Dalvorig and Gheliguzan, and with the execrations of the civilized world still sounding in their ears in denunciation of these and other crimes, the Turks have again glutted the soil of several districts in Armenia with the blood of many hundreds of defenceless victims—new martyrs to the Christian cause. Thus, notwithstanding the plausible promises of reforms by the Sublime Porte, the policy which the Rev. Cyrus Hamlin, the veteran missionary, aptly described as one of "absolute extermination" is still being remorselessly carried out in Armenia. Intelligence comes to the effect that in the recent disturbances at Trebizond, referred to in a previous issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, "at least six hundred Armenians were slain, while only a few Turks were killed. The Armenian settlements were set on fire and the inhabitants were burned to death or shot." In addition to the news of this savage massacre, involving all the horrors of the Sassoun and Dalvorig butcheries, although on a smaller scale, there comes by cable the story of a similar sanguinary event at Erzinjan, where several hundred Armenians were killed. An outbreak of the most frightful character is reported from Baiburt, near Erzeroum. Five hundred Moslem troops attacked and massacred the Armenians in several villages, burning men at the stake and torturing and outraging many women, besides desecrating churches and stealing cattle and other property. At Bitlis a number of Armenians were killed in the streets during a fight with the Moslems. After its usual fashion of explaining such outrages, the Porte, through a circular addressed to the leading European governments, has attempted to show that the disarmed and helpless Armenians were the aggressors, in these "disturbances"—the latter expression being one generally used when a massacre is in question.

REV. CYRUS HAMLIN, D.D.

The Veteran Missionary to Asia Minor.

Letters from Trebizond to the Daily News of London, state that there were over 700 Christian Armenians slaughtered in that city, and 200 in the neighboring villages. Untold horrors are implied in this brief statement, and there is little doubt that the full recital will disclose a story of Turkish barbarity equaled only by the butcheries of 1894. The letter adds that many Armenian women have vanished, having been either murdered or kidnapped; that most of the Armenian houses have been burned to the ground, the survivors of the latest massacres being driven like wild beasts to the hills and woods, where they are now living. There has also been trouble in the Marash district, and the missionaries are in peril.

Meanwhile, the continued persecutions all over Armenia are adding to the number of the sufferers from hunger and want throughout that unfortunate country. Every letter received here has brought the news of intense suffering in the Sassoun district, as well as at Van and Erzeroum. News is now daily looked for announcing the arrival of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner and the opening of the Relief work, but owing to the slow means of communication, together with the disturbed condition of the country, cablegrams will doubtless be subjected to some delay.

A letter from a Sassoun fugitive, lately received, gives the saddening story of the experience of one family. It is typical of the experience of thousands of others. He writes:

"Our family was composed of ten members, and were natives of Semal, a village in Sassoun. We fought the Kurds to protect our lives and property; but when the Turkish soldiers united with the Kurds, we fled. I was with my father. He could not run away because he was very weak, having eaten nothing for many days. I entered, with the rest of my family, into a thick forest. The soldiers overtook my father and struck him with their swords, disembowling him; they filled his body with gunpowder and set fire to him. Afterwards I went with others and gathered up what remained of my poor father and buried him.

"With the rest of my family I remained forty days in the forests, subsisting on herbs and roots until the soldiers were recalled, and there was nobody to pursue us. We came down to Moosh, and the government sent us to Khibian, a village in the Moosh plain, where we remained in a delapitated hut with very little to eat. All of us became sick from hunger and cold; two girls and one boy died, and the rest, six members of our family, all now wandering from village to village, naked and hungry."

We would hesitate to soil the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by describing many of the revolting cruelties inflicted by the fanatical Turks upon the defenceless Armenians. Neither age nor sex have been spared. A final refusal to deny Christ and accept Islam sealed the fate of the Armenian. Such horrible tortures as flaying alive, cutting to pieces by swords, tearing out the eyes, branding on the body with red-hot irons and even tearing out the entrails, filling up the cavity with gunpowder and exploding it—these were among the simplest of the diabolical measures adopted by the Sultan's officials and his soldiery in dealing with his Christian Armenian subjects whom, even under his own Koran, he was in duty bound to protect. Women torn from their homes and outraged, and hundreds of young girls forcibly carried off, fiendishly used and wantonly slain, and other horrors unnamable and unfit to print, are some of the methods employed with the Sultan's permission, in upholding the glory of Islam.

At this juncture, when the already widespread suffering has been intensified and multiplied by the recent massacres, which have added hundreds of Christian families to the list of the destitute wanderers, our Relief Committee will face a most formidable task. We expect to be able within a short time to publish cheering accounts of the progress of the work. The following contributions to the Fund were received during the week:

BABY'S FOOTSTEPS.

REMEMBER of once readin' a tender, sweet refrain ven from the fancy of some dreamin' poet's brain.
lin' of the joy that comes when lyin' in your bed, u hear the rain-drops fallin' on the shingles overhead.
me folks may not think so, but with him I quite agree.
t the simple sounds of nature hold the sweetest melody;
d that is why I'm thinkin' that there's no tune quite so sweet the soft, melodious patter of baby's little feet.
m early mornin's brightness till evenin's gatherin' gloom, hear the tuneful patter of his footsteps in each room;
w along the hallway, now upon the stair, and down, come and go, wanderin' here and there, in' all the hours with the music of his tread,
'l sleep o'ercomes and bears him a captive to his bed.
s with joy I leave the hustle and the bustle of the street r the gentle, restful patter of baby's little feet.
ey have worn a pathway that winds all through my breast, d their soothin', patterin' music lulls me to my nightly rest, d even when sleep has claimed me I hear it in my dreams,
e symphonies of angels, so mellow-like it seems.
ere is somethin' very pleasin' in the whisperin' of the trees.
the murmurin' of a mountain brook, in the sighin' of the breeze;
t in all of art or nature there is no tone that can beat e smooth, harmonious patter of baby's little feet.

—WILLIAM WEST.

Florida's Wondrous Woods.

eat Groves of Oak, Pine, and Orange—The Giant Banyan and Lofty Paw-Paw—Animal Life in the Southern Forests.

WITH the approach of winter, which comes with a degree of rigor in many of our Middle and Northern States, the perfect climate of the South holds out many attractions to those who dwell colder latitudes. Every year witnesses increasing temporary migration to Flora, some going there for the pleasure of ld and stream only, others for health, hile a third class, who are possessed of mple means, go simply because they dise the boreal blasts that sweep the North, id prefer to prolong the summer experces by a regular winter visit to our autiful semi-tropical peninsula. Hunrs and tourists rejoice over the fact, owever, that even yet the population ong the rivers and bayous is so sparsely at it does not break in upon the picturiqueness of the scenery or destroy the harm of primeval beauty that is the ecial attraction of the Florida forests.

There is, indeed, no lovelier sight than ne banks of a Florida river. As a rule, ne spiny palmetto fringes the margin, iversified at intervals with orange and anana groves. Sheepshead, pompano, ullet and green turtles are caught in bundance in these streams. Wherever here is a clearing and a plantation, there re beautiful avenues of cabbage-palms, ith gleaming, shell-covered walks, and profuse growth of orange, lemon, banana nd grape, rich in color and copious in perume. Magnolias and feathery-crested awpaws add to the beauty of the landcape, and even in the wild woods there is uch a delightful confusion of color and uch a mingling of perfumes that the enses become gratefully appreciative.

One of the wonders of Florida is the banyan or rubber-tree, a gigantic specimen of which is shown in the illustration on this page. There are only two of this mammoth size known to exist in this country, one of them being among the chief curiosities of Key West. Even the branches of this remarkable tree have bent back and become almost as firmly rooted in the soil as the parent trunk. Some species of the banyan fix the points of their branches in the ground, while others send out shoots from the stem which drop root-tendrils, and the latter seek the earth and cling to it firmly.

There is so much variety of motion and vitality in the Florida woods and along the streams that one cannot be dull. At some lake or at a point where the stream expands into a bay, the presence of a boat is the signal for myriads of water fowl to rise and darken the air momentarily in their flight. There are coot, water-hens, duck, and many other species and the noise created by the simultaneous flapping of their wings and their startled cries is callated to frighten timid tourists who are unused to such scenes. In the deep, dark woods there are found deer, bear, panther, raccoon, and where the forest runs down to lake or river, through mangrove marshes, the hoarse piping of frogs, the stertorous grunt of the alligator and other noises, all give evidence of the presence of animal life in every direction. To the lover of nature, the disciple of Isaac Walton, or the invalid whose body and brain need reinvigoration, there are few parts of the Union more delightful to visit than Florida.

A Life Spent for Woman.

One of the best-known women in the United States, a number of years ago, was Virginia Penny, whose ceaseless efforts to open new spheres of activity to women were everywhere praised. When she began her work, there were not more than half a dozen avenues of employment open to women, and to-day there are about four hundred. To her task she devoted time, energies and fortune. Two books which she wrote were of themselves sufficient to stamp her as a woman of talent,—one entitled "Think and Act," and the other "Five Hundred Occupations for Women." She was engaged by the Census Bureau in collecting statistics concerning woman's labor, and did so in a most efficient manner. Sickness came, and with loss of health came poverty, and Miss Penny now finds herself homeless and helpless and destitute in her old age.

The Pleasures of Country Living.

We apt to under-estimate the influences of small things. Because people live in the country, there is no reason why they should not look as neat and attractive in the home circle there as they would do if they were dwellers in town. The planting of flowers and trees around each farmhouse is a great benefaction to the human race, and the general introduction of the bath-tub would materially advance the standard of rural life. The daily associations between boys and girls should be elevating and refining. The art of conversation and the spirit of true politeness should be encouraged and cultivated. The habit of wearing clean linen after the labor of the day is ended, and the ladylike habit of appearing during the evening in a fresh dress, however simple, add greatly to the attractiveness as well as to the dignity of country living.

A Typical Pleasant Home.

One of the kindest remarks that can be made about a house, writes an experienced home-maker, is that it is one where people like to "drop in." Formal receptions and at homes are well for those who take to that sort of amusement, but there is no such possibility of delightful companionship in them as in a company met by chance in a cozy parlor. Such a house seems to gather its frequenters by happy fortune—it is impossible to say exactly how. Its rooms are pleasant, but not too fine; the very chairs and tables have a sociable, hospitable air. "Come, sit down, gather around," they say. "Make yourself comfortable." We look at the sofa pillows in their varying tints, and each one seems entreating, in higher or lower key, that it shall be put behind somebody's back. The light from the windows of such a house fairly beckon old acquaintances as they go by of an evening. It isn't necessary to tell your friends you are glad to see them; if you really are they will soon find it out. It isn't necessary to amuse them; if they are interesting people, who are on good terms with each other, they will amuse themselves and you. It isn't necessary to feed them; they probably have enough to eat at home. But when it comes to saying what is essential to make your home a centre of charming social intercourse, that is a more difficult matter; for charming social intercourse is a plant of slow growth, which requires rich soil and good cultivation.

The Oil of Love.

Love is a great lubricator in all the jars and wrangles and disagreeable places of life. It is related of a cross old man that when his servant left him, he went and told all his woes to a neighbor. It happened, however, that the neghbor knew his weakness. "I think it would be well to oil yourself a little," said he. "When a door in my house creaks I oil the hinges. Go home, engage a servant, and when he does right praise him. If he does anything amiss, oil your voice and words with love." No harsh words were ever heard from the old gentleman after that. How much of the groaning and despair and misery of the world would be cured if the words of every Christian were kept saturated with this wonderful oil!

HOME JEALOUSIES.

IN most families the two most undesirable places in the record of births are the first and the last, the first because a daughter may be worn out with the cares of a home that cannot afford to hire help, and the last because she is spoiled as a pet. Among the grandest equipages that sweep through the streets of heaven, writes Dr. Talmage, will be those occupied by sisters who sacrificed themselves for brothers. They will have the finest of the Apocalyptic white horses, and many who on earth looked down upon them will have to turn out to let them pass.

Let sisters not begrudge the time and care bestowed on a brother. It is hard to believe that any boy that you know so well as your brother can ever turn out anything very useful. Well, he may not be a Moses. There is only one of that kind needed for six thousand years. But I tell you what your brother will be—either a blessing or a curse to society, and a candidate for happiness or wretchedness. He will, like Moses, have the choice between rubies and living coals, and your influence will have much to do with his decision. He may not, like Moses, be the deliverer of a nation, but he may, after your father and mother are gone, be the deliverer of a household. What thousands of homes today are piloted by brothers! There are properties now well invested and yielding incomes for the support of sisters and younger brothers, because the older brother rose to the leadership from the day the father lay down to die. Whatever you do for your brother will come back to you again. Don't snub him. Don't depreciate his ability. Don't talk discouragingly about his future.

Brothers and sisters do not consider it any harm to tease. That spirit abroad in the family is one of the meanest. There is a teasing that is pleasurable, and is only another form of innocent raillery, but that which provokes, and irritates, and makes the eye flash with anger is to be reprehended. It would be less blameworthy to take a bunch of thorns and draw them across your sister's cheek, or to take a knife and draw its sharp edge across your brother's hand till the blood spurts, for that would damage only the body, but teasing is the thorn and the knife, scratching and lacerating the disposition and the soul. It is the curse of innumerable households that the brothers tease the sisters, and the sisters the brothers. A thousand home troubles and vexations might be avoided if teasing were not indulged.

Don't let jealousy ever touch a sister's soul, as it so often does, because her brother gets more honor or more means. Let there be no room in all your house for jealousy either to sit or stand. Your brother's success, oh sisters, is your success. His victories will be your victories. How strong it makes a family when all the sisters and brothers stand together, and what an awful wreck when they disintegrate, quarrelling about a father's will and making the surrogate's office horrible with their wrangles.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUR.

WE enjoyed the last Hallow Eve, or, as they say in Scotland, "Hallow E'en." Robert Burns puts it into rhythm, and all through Christendom it is celebrated. Ten thousand households ring out at such time with merry laughter, and door-bells are pulled by hands that vanish before the door is opened. The spirit of innocent mischief-making goes abroad, and it is the children's night for games and antics innumerable. All hail, "Hallow E'en," as it comes season after season. Put no restraint upon the harmless hilarities of such a night. All that goes to make children's lives blithesome, I favor. Multiply their sports rather than deplete them. Urge them on rather than discourage them. I wish that as the 31st of October is "Hallow E'en," there might be in each season a corresponding day.

The whole tendency of the time is to abbreviate the frolicsomenes of youth. We have no boys and girls nowadays; they are young gentlemen and ladies. They scarcely get out of the cradle before upon them comes an avalanche of books. The rigid proprieties of life crowd up to the verge of the high chair at the table. The children who will be men and women fifteen years from now will not start life with a surplus of spirits with which some of us were endowed by the outdoor romps and recreations of life in the country. Life is a struggle even for those most prosperous, and the chief work of the first twelve years of it ought to be gathering up a reservoir full of strength and exuberance that could supply all the years subsequent. Of course parental supervisal must forbid the small cruelties and the meannesses which sometimes creep into children's fun, but I think one of the great mistakes of home-life in our time is the lack of sympathy for the joys of juvenescence. In almost every day and in every household there ought to be the "children's hour," and all the hilarities should be arranged with reference to childish appreciation.

It is a sad thing in a man's life where the boy dies out of his temperament. It is a sad time in a woman's life when the girl dies out of her disposition. If we had more of the Hallow E'en in our hearts our life would be happier and more useful, and childhood in our homes would be a bright experience. But in many a prosperous household there is little provision made for the entertainment of life under fifteen years of age. By day the children are at school, and at night the father comes home tired and with patience gone, and soon after ten the children see the shadow of bedtime approaching. All may go well, even with such small allowance of merriment, but when the great burdens of life come down upon the shoulders of the young people, will they be able to endure the weight?

Blessed are those who enter upon active life with a supply of superfluous energy. Childhood is the time for its accumulation. The ball-playing, the lawn-tennis, the croquet, the coasting down the hillside, the snowballing, the skating, and the "Hallow E'ens," are the means of multiplying the resources of life and good cheer and courage so requisite to the right discharge of the hard work of a lifetime.

RELIGION IN TRADE.

WHY are ten thousand of our business men ridden with a nightmare enough to crush Hercules and Prometheus? It is the want of a right kind of store lamp. What ruined the merchant princes of Tyre, that great city of fairs and bazaars and palaces; her vessels of trade with cedar masts and embroidered sails and ivory benches, driven by fierce blasts on Northern waters, and then dropping down on glassy Indian seas; bringing wine from Helbon, and chariot cloths from Dedan, and gold and spices from Rahmah, and emerald and agate from Syria; her waters foaming with innumerable keels; her storehouses bursting with the treasures of all nations—that queen of cities, on a throne of ivory and ebony, under a crown of gold and pearl and diamond and carbuncle and chrysoprase? The want of a right kind of store lamp. If the principles of religion had ruled in her trade, do you suppose that dry rot would have sunk the ships, and that vermin would have eaten up her robes, and that God's mills would have ground up the agate, and that fishermen would dry their nets on the rocks which once were a-quake with the roar and tread of a great metropolis. O, what thrones have fallen, what monuments have crumbled, what fleets have sunk, what statues have been defaced, what barbarism has been created, what civilization retarded, what nations damned, all for the want of the right kind of a store lamp. Men of business! take your Bibles with you. Place them in your store or shop. Do not be ashamed if anybody at noon finds you reading the Scriptures. It is safe always to do business by its teachings.

NO PRAYER LOST.

SOME time ago we saw a curious discussion upon the question us to where went all the pins, buckles, and needles that were manufactured. When so many large establishments are turning them out, whatever becomes of them? Some again enter the earth from which they came forth a metal, some crumble into rust. They are all lost, but where do they go to? There is a more interesting question to us, however, and that is the question "Where do all the prayers go to?" What becomes of them—of the tens of thousands that are every day offered. Are they answered? Not half of them, not a fourth of them. If there be millions of Christians on earth and each Christian man makes one prayer a day—and we do not see how a Christian man could content himself and maintain his spirituality even with that small modicum—then there are millions of supplications going up before the throne of God. Everything that can be desired for the individual heart, everything that can be desired for the Church, everything that can be desired for all the nations is asked for hour after hour, and moment after moment. Now, we are very conscious that a great many of the prayers that we have offered have never been answered. While we may sometimes be in doubt as to whether or not certain temporal successes are best for us,—when we come before God and ask him for a spiritual blessing, we know that is best for us. But what has become of all the prayers? We have often asked that we might be perfectly conformed to Jesus Christ; not once has that prayer been answered. We have asked for the redemption of all the people that attend our church on the Sabbath day; that prayer never has been answered. We have asked for the salvation of this entire land, and still there are multitudes sitting in darkness, many of them not knowing so much as that there is a Holy Ghost. There are millions of Christians day by day imploring God for the salvation of the whole world, and the supplication has never been answered. Does God, then, keep his promise? Is prayer a dead failure? Does God mock the Christian Church? Are we told to bring all our gifts into the storehouse and prove him, only to find out that he breaks his promise?

The answer to prayer is only a question of time. So far from there ever having been a million prayers lost, there has never been one prayer lost. God not only keeps one promise, but he keeps all the promises, and never since the moment we first breathed the Christian life have we ever offered an unavailing prayer.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

A. D. Hakes, 133 Eighth avenue, writes:

I am very anxious to know if any of your readers know of this song. I only know the one verse and chorus:

O, escape to yonder mountain,
Now begin to watch and pray;
Christ invites you to his fountain,
Come and wash your sins away.

J. Luhrs, Philadelphia, Pa. What is the latest estimate of the wealth of the leading nations of the civilized world?

The valuation of all property in the United States, according to the census of 1890, was $65,037,091,197, or $1036 per capita, but of this probably over $5,000,000,000 represents foreign capital invested here. The valuation in Great Britain was $50,000,000,000 and France, $40,000,000,000. France has about $4,000,000,000 of foreign investments, chiefly Italian and Spanish, and England has about $8,000,000,000. Germany, Russia and Austria come next in the order of importance.

Clara M——, Edinburgh, Pa. 1. What should be the attitude of a young Christian toward the worldly amusements? 2. Are there any that are not questionable? 3. Can the theatre be idealized according to the idea of a Chicago minister, who thinks it can be brought up to a standard of purity, and one that will meet the ideas of Christians?

1. This is a question which enters into the life of every young Christian at some stage of spiritual experience. The only safe attitude is to distinguish between those amusements that hinder spiritual growth and those that are innocuous. Thus card-playing and dancing, though they may not be sinful "per se," are to be condemned because of their associations and temptations. No one has ever been helped by them and thousands have found them a stepping-stone to moral and physical ruin. 2. Yes; decidedly, there are many, both indoors and outdoors, that are harmless. 3. We do not believe it can be wholly dissociated from evil influences. Theatre-going, even in its best aspect, is a positive detriment to spiritual growth. It creates an unreal atmosphere and gives us false notions of life and human actions and motives. For one play that may be helpful, there are a hundred that are hurtful. It is generally acknowledged that theatre-going and a false standard of morals are apt to go together.

J. F. Thompson, Greely, Col. Why do people try to contend that the days of creation were long periods, and not natural days of twenty-four hours?

The strata of the earth are composed of materials which indicate the passage of immense periods of time. There is no question as to the power of the Omnipotent to have made the earth in six natural days; but it is very improbable that if he had done so the strata would be as we find them. They show marks of intense heat, and of a condition in which animal life could not have existed. There is layer upon layer showing the gradual cooling of the crust of the earth, and of long periods in which only creatures who could live in mud existed, and the process of preparing the earth for such creatures as ourselves can be traced. It is reasonable to believe that God did not put such signs in the earth to mislead man.

Mrs. I. S., Casey, Ia. 1. To what does Paul refer in Colossians 2: 12, by the expression "Wherein ye were raised"? 2. Were there any children included in the household whose baptism is mentioned in the New Testament? 3. Is the assertion of Paul in his ministration Cor. 7: 6-12 of any more consequence to us than that of a minister of the present day?

1. Paul is speaking of resurrection life, which was one of his favorite subjects. He was urging his readers to live spiritual lives, caring no more for the gratification of the flesh than if they had actually passed through death and got rid of their bodies. 2. If anyone knew positively, there might be an end of the controversy between the Baptists and other denominations. If it could be proved that Apostles baptized children, or servants who had not accepted Christianity, simply because the head of the household had become a Christian, then the whole question would be settled. We are most heartily and sincerely sorry that there is no record. 3. The words permission and commandment do not refer to Paul himself but to his readers. They are permitted, but not commanded to do these things. He does not mean that he is permitted, not command, to so write. His opinion, therefore, has all the weight of inspiration. In verse 11 he says following Christ's teaching, but in verse 12 he gives his own directions in the absence of any command of Christ.

J. J. Landon, Montgomery, Ala. What is the missionary prospect in Corea and how has the work been affected by the late war?

The prospect is encouraging, and the field of missionary work is great. Hopes were entertained that the party of progress would have been able to carry out its programme of reform, but these have been shattered, and the old official abuses are returning. Still the outlook for spiritual work is good and will doubtless improve as the country becomes pacified.

Randolph Towns, Dubuque, Ia. Who established the first American Sunday School Union?

It was established by a group of members of different denominations in Philadelphia including Quakers, on January 11, 1791. The organization was called "the First Day or Sunday School Society."

Constant Reader, Etna, Ill. 1. In what sense does Isaiah declare 45: 7 that God creates evil? 2. Who was the Queen of Heaven referred to in Jeremiah 44: 17. 3. Will people be punished for not reading the Bible?

1. The word "evil" occurs in an antithesis. It is the opposite of peace. Isaiah appears to mean that God will punish the bad or bring evil upon them, as surely as he will bless the good. Job makes use of the same expression. (2: 16.) "Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and shall we not receive evil?" 2. The moon, worshipped under the title of Ashtoreth or Astarte. In the ancient mythology regarded as the wife of Baal the sun god. 3. Do you consider it likely that God will approve the conduct of a man, who believing the Bible to be a revelation of God's will, does not read it?

Inquirer, Sidney, Ia. 1. How many years was Noah building the ark? 2. Are people ever forgiven when they repent or not until they are baptized?

1. The warning of God that men's days should be a hundred and twenty years (Gen. 6: 3) may imply that the ark was that length of time in preparation. The words are frequently represented as declaring that in future that would be the normal length of life; but it is evident that that was not the meaning because the ages of the men living after the flood as given in the eleventh chapter of Genesis are still of the former length. Whether it really took a hundred and twenty years to build the ark is, however, still uncertain and is not worth considering. 2. They are forgiven when he exercises faith in Christ and asks God for Christ's sake to forgive them, resolving in his strength to renounce the sin and live henceforth for Christ.

A. F. W., Danville, Ga. Will God forgive one who fell into sin after conversion if he really repents? Or do you think his fall after being once forgiven is too bad for him to be forgiven again?

God will forgive his child who goes to him in sorrow and asks forgiveness. David's sin was of the vilest, most despicable kind, but he was forgiven. If any one had reason for despair, Peter had, when he denied his Lord in the hour of his trial, yet he was forgiven. The Apostle Paul was writing to Christians (II. Cor. 7: 10, 11) and he indicated what their conduct ought to be after falling and being restored. The Christian who falls into sin has reason for bitter sorrow; but if he despairs he dishonors God by misjudging him and casting to him an implacable disposition.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

To Study Australian Weather.

SCIENCE is slowly but persistently gaining an understanding of the problems presented by the weather. The latest effort on a large scale to collect new facts is being made in the southern hemisphere. A meteorological observatory has just been established in Tasmania, the little island on the south of Australia, which was formerly called Van Diemen's Land. This island was for many years used by England as a penal colony to which she sent forgers, burglars and other criminals whose sentences of penal servitude exceeded seven years. In deference to the protests of the colonist settlers, that practice was at length abandoned. On the island is the high mountain, Mount Wellington, whose summit is 4160 feet above the sea level. It is on the top of this mountain that the new meteorological station has been built. A curious fact about it is that it is almost exactly the antipodes of Ben Nevis the highest mountain in Scotland, the top of which is 4406 feet above the sea. Fourteen years ago a meteorological observatory was stationed on Ben Nevis, under the superintendence of Mr. Clement L. Wragge; and it is he who has now gone to Tasmania to take charge of the new station, about the same altitude among the clouds on the other side of the earth. Simultaneous observations are to be taken in the stations on the two mountains, and at stations on the level at the base of each: and it is expected that a comparison of the records will furnish a clue to the mystery of the sudden storms which do so much damage. Mr. Wragge believes that with the facts thus gathered, he can make, ten days ahead forecasts which will be verified with an accuracy never yet attained. If his hopes are realized, the benefit to Australia will be inestimable, as it suffers as much as tropical lands from droughts, floods and rainy weather changes. But the benefit will not be confined to Australia if he succeeds, as he expects, in proving and reducing to system the connection between the vertical distribution of the atmosphere and violent meteorological disturbances. When that principle is fully understood, sudden storms will not so often as now sweep down upon us unawares, destroying life and property. We shall know what causes them and learn to recognize the signs that precede their coming. It would be well if we could also learn to recognize the signs that presage moral disaster, so that no man should sow to the wind and reap the whirlwind. If we get more sagacity in meteorology and not in moral perception, Christ will have reason to ask us, as he asked the people of his day:

"Ye can discern the face of the sky; but can ye not discern the signs of the times? (Matt. 16: 3).

A Conditional Privilege.

The Commissioner of Street Cleaning in New York has earned the ill-will of a number of manufacturers and wholesale dealers down town by forcibly removing the gutter-bridges in front of their premises. A gutter-bridge is a wooden inclined plane connecting the sidewalk with the roadway, which facilitates the backing of trucks and wagons across the gutters to the stores. It usually only one or two thick planks about eight inches wide, with a strong metal clip attaching it to the curbstone. The Commissioner's seizure started the rumor that the gutter-bridges were to be abolished, but he has given an explanation of his action which removes that idea. He says that according to law a citizen who puts a gutter-bridge in front of his premises must pay a dollar a year for the privilege and must give an undertaking that it shall be so constructed as to allow a free flow of water in the gutter under it, and must remove it once a week and clear away any dirt or other obstructions that may have gathered undor it. He had stated only the gutter-bridges that were improperly made, and those whose owners had not complied with the conditions of the permit. The grumblers can now understand why they have lost the convenience. Some people might understand in the same way why they have suffered losses of property, or children, or health. God in his providence sometimes withdraws privileges when those who have them do not put them to a good use, but neglect to improve them or turn them to evil.

Why criest thou for thine affliction? Because thy sins were increased I have done these things unto thee. (Jeremiah 30: 15.)

The Lost Silver Ledge.

The steamer "Willapa" from Alaska, which arrived at Seattle, Wash., a few days ago, brought reports of a new search now going on for the famous silver ledge on Queen Charlotte Island, which has been a will-o-the-wisp for forty years. Two young men, connected with wealthy families in Colorado, had landed on the island and started on a careful and systematic examination of the coast, and guided by information received from Indians, were sanguine of finding the place. Old prospectors, however, are sceptical and say that many have started just as confidently on the quest during the past forty years, who have come back disappointed. It appears that belief in the existence of the ledge is based on the story of a man who discovered it accidentally and did not know its value. He was not a miner, but went to the island in 1854 for amusement, with a party of seventy prospectors, who were searching for gold. They were unsuccessful in their search, but he made a great discovery. Wandering aimlessly about the island, he saw in the rocks a peculiar vein that interested him. It extended a long distance and was twelve inches thick. He chipped a few pieces off and brought them away with him. His companions laughed at him when he showed his specimens and told him it was plumbago he had found, but he kept the pieces of rock, and when he returned to Portland, had them assayed. They yielded fifty per cent. of silver. He determined to return as soon as possible and secure the fabulous wealth awaiting a claimant. But though he searched diligently, he was never able to locate the place and died a disappointed man. His story incited many others to search, but though some have sacrificed time, money and life itself in the quest, the rich lode has never been found. Still, it appears, the search is attracting new followers. It is a pity that men are not as earnest in their search for truth, in which success is assured and is far better worth having.

More to be desired are they than gold; yea than much fine gold. (Ps. 19: 10.)

THE NEW OBSERVATORY IN TASMANIA—THE CONVOY OF THE INSTRUMENTS.

Dyeing the Burglars.

The ludicrous result of an attempt at burglary is reported by a Boston journal. It states that the owner of a dyeing establishment was engaged till a late hour over some experiments in the laboratory which opens on the main floor where the vats are. Finding when he had finished the experiments that it was past midnight, he decided to pass the remainder of the night on a sofa in the laboratory. About an hour afterward, he was awakened by a noise in the main room. He listened and came to the conclusion that there were burglars there. He felt around for a pistol and having found one, stepped to the door of the room and saw that two men were making up a package of his most expensive dyes. He covered them with his revolver and then called to them to leave his property alone. The men who evidently had no idea that any one was in the building, were panic-stricken. They dropped the package and ran for their lives. In their haste they stumbled into a large vat filled with indigo and falling headlong, were completely covered by the dark fluid. When they regained their feet and climbed out, they were a curious spectacle with hands, face and clothes a livid blue. The dyer suffered them to depart, speculating in his mind how they would manage to get rid of the evidence of their guilt. A few days afterward he heard from a friend, who keeps a large drug-store, that the men had been to him and offered him five dollars if he would tell them how to get their flesh free from the dye. They had scrubbed themselves till they were sore, without stirring the color. It would be well if this lesson should lead them to repentance and reformation of character. If it should, they will be more concerned about the cleansing of their hearts than their faces, and only by the blood of Christ can that be done.

Though thou wash thee with nitre and take thee much soap, yet thy iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God. (Jer. 2; 22.)

Flight from Fire at Sea.

The Captain of the steamer "St. Augustine" who with his crew arrived at Boston, on Oct. 24th, on board the "City of Macon," relates a thrilling story of danger and rescue. The "St. Augustine" was on her regular trip from New York to Florida, and was two days out, when a man came up from the engine-room and told the captain that the cargo was on fire. Smoke was issuing from the main hold, which was filled with cases of merchandise. They were packed so closely that it was impossible to get at the fire. With the hand-extinguishers and the hose, all was done that could be done, but the fire burned on. The Captain learned that there were two hundred barrels of oil in the cargo, and that they were stowed just where the flames would soon reach them. Then he knew that there was no hope of saving the ship, and that the only hope of saving the lives of the crew lay in instantly taking to the boats. No time was lost. The boats were hastily provisioned and lowered. No one tried to save anything he had. The Captain left his valuable charts and instruments, and the men their little belongings, and hurried into the boats. Fifteen minutes after they were clear of the ship, it was a mass of flames. They drifted about for an hour, and then "The City of Macon," attracted by the light of the burning ship, bore down and took them all on board. They lost everything they had but the clothes they were wearing; but they were too thankful for the preservation of their lives to worry over their losses. So will it be at the last with those whose souls are saved. The sacrifices they may have had to make will seem trivial to them compared with the blessing they have gained.

Every one that hath forsaken houses or lands for my name's sake, ... shall inherit everlasting life. Matt. 19: 29.

BRIEF NOTES.

All Letters to Dr. Talmage as Editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be addressed to him at the Bible House, New York, as heretofore.

Mrs Bella Cooke asks us to Acknowledge the Receipt of Two Dollars sent to her by a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Church Missionary Society's Report for the past year shows that among its missionaries, one hundred and four are working without pay from the Society, living either on their own income or on means supplied by personal friends. The income of the Society for the year was $1,360,000.

An Attempt is about to be Made to Reach the literary classes in China by means of a Christian newspaper printed in Chinese. It is to be conducted by a joint committee of Presbyterian, Wesleyan, Congregational and Baptist missionaries. It is thought many Chinamen would read a newspaper who would not attend a service.

More Chinese Outrages are Reported. A dispatch from Shanghai to a London house says that riots have broken out in Changpu, in the Southeast part of the Island of Amoy, and the English missions there have been destroyed. The missionaries appealed to the mandarins for protection, but those officials refused to interfere.

A Great Camp-Meeting is Reported from Goodwater, Ala. The Hatchet Creek Presbyterian Church was crowded and overflow meetings were held in the open air. A correspondent writes that the season was one never to be forgotten by any who witnessed it. Both in conversions and in the quickening of believers the Spirit's power was manifest in a wonderful manner.

Rev. Geo. C. Needham has Arranged to conduct a Bible Conference for the promotion of spiritual life this week in New York. The meetings will be held in the Church of the Disciples, West 56th Street, November 4–9, at 3.30 and 7.30 each day. Drs. Erdman and A. C. Dixon will take part in the proceedings. Mr. Needham will give an account of the recent conferences at Mildmay and Keswick, England which he attended.

As Dr. Talmage's Removal to Washington precludes him from resuming the Sunday afternoon services in the Academy of Music, New York, which were so largely attended last year, Rev. Thomas Dixon has arranged to hold a service in that building in connection with "The People's Church" every Sunday afternoon at four o'clock. He hopes to reach the large masses of people who attend no church at all on the Lord's Day.

Successful Evangelistic Services Have Been held at Kalamazoo, Mich., by Major Whittle and Major Cole. The First Baptist and the First Congregational Churches and the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association were filled by eager crowds on Sundays and week-days. Beside these several services were held in the Presbyterian Church. Major Whittle also held a service for the prisoners confined in the jail.

Dr. John G. Paton, the Venerable Missionary of New Hebrides, who recently visited this country, has arrived safely at his station at Anewa. In a letter just received by the Rev. W. C. McGarvey, of Buffalo, N. Y., Dr. Paton writes: "On my return to Anewa I find that the work has gone on successfully in my absence, and at all our stations we have never had so much fruit and blessed results as during the last twelve months."

Ira D. Sankey, who Edits the Service of Song in this journal every week, is now writing the history of the "Gospel Hymns," together with incidents of blessing in connection therewith. He wishes very much that ministers, Christian workers and others would send him in writing, accounts of striking incidents that may have fallen under their own personal observation, in connection with the use of these sacred songs. Only well authenticated facts are asked for by Mr. Sankey, whose address is 148 South Oxford Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Maritime Provinces have had Three Enthusiastic conventions this season. The Baptists, who met at St. John's, N. B., had a large attendance and discussed several important matters. The Christian Endeavorers held their convention at Truro, N. S. There are now 595 Societies in this Union, with an aggregate membership of over 27,000. Their contributions to missionary work last year were more than $7,000. The Epworth Leagues of Christian Endeavor also held a convention of their own. The reports showed a large increase, both in membership and in the number of Leagues.

Agressive Christian Endeavor Work Is Not confined to the land of the Society's birth. The Yarra Street Wesleyan Society in Geelong, Australia, in its fifth annual report, makes a phenomenal showing. During the year 1218 visits were made, an average of 158 weekly; sprays and baskets of flowers to the number of 1279 were distributed and sent by mail; various meetings numbering 558 were held, and more than 25,000 persons attended these; 206 persons were led to sign the temperance pledge. Although the membership of the society is only 211, more than $500 in cash was raised.

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

AN ORDER FROM THE GENERAL IN COMMAND.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Plitchenti Defile.

THAT was a frightful winter in the Balkans. The Russian soldiers, inured as they were to the severity of their own rude northern climate, were unable to withstand the horrors of those terrible weeks. It had been cold enough in the plains south of the Danube, but as they ascended the elevated plateau and difficult passes of the mountains, the weather became worse and ever worse, and the troops fell ready victims to its inclemency.

The most shocking negligence and bad management had been displayed by the commissariat department, and until the present day, it remains an unsolved question whether or not the shortness of supplies of food and clothing was the outcome of criminal and cruel greed and corruption, or merely one of the many unhappy accidents which dogged the fortunes of the Russian arms. When the cold weather began, the famished troops were assured that in a few days unlimited supplies of sheepskins would be on their way to the Bulgarian armies. Week followed week, and only a few of these indispensable garments filtered into camp. Were they ever purchased at all? Who knows. Did they ever leave Russia? If they did, who stole them? It will never be known. Enormous sums went in the purchase of bread. It was supposed that meal and flour were bought in quantities more than sufficient for the wants of the army. But in midwinter, nevertheless, the gallant troops starved on mouldy and gritty rubbish that often crawled with maggots, while Jew and Christian alike, the scoundrelly middlemen and contractors, some of them high in favor, men of unblemished character, amassed colossal fortunes. There was no murmuring among the brave fellows who were suffering. They died by the hundred and the thousand from exposure to the piercing frosts, again by hundreds and thousands from dysentery, the result of bad and insufficient food. The want of warm clothing, and the sandy rye bread, did more damage to the Russian army during many a week of that awful winter than the skill and bravery of the Turks. It was not until the following spring when the deep snows had melted off the mountains that the full horror of the winter —that awful winter that had been passed was realized.

But, however, much of attraction and interest there may be for us in following the fate and fortunes of the great army as it blindly, but bravely, stumbled through the deep snows of the Balkans, every day with its record of patient endurance and noble heroism rarely paralleled in the annals of armies, we must not forget that we are immediately concerned with the fortunes of those few individuals who have already passed across our stage, with the two young soldiers whom last we saw in the fading light of a peaceful spring evening, speeding to their places at the front, with the young soldier servant who accompanied them seeking distraction from his great sorrow.

Sergei Alekhin had been placed in charge of one outlying detachment, and it was owing to his constant and sleepless vigilance that the gorge had remained hitherto unattacked, and that the place became stronger every day that passed. It was a cruel position in which to place these devoted men, but mercy is a secondary consideration in the exigencies of even the most civilized warfare. The little camp lay on a knoll in the centre of the defile between two mural precipices, and exposed to the full force of the hurricanes that shrieked down it from the northern snows. Snow lay deep all around, on every ledge and jut and spot flat enough to bear it. Behind the camp was piled up a scanty supply of firewood not sufficient for two nights proper firing, but which was nevertheless, the remaining half of a months' supply. The water the soldiers drank was obtained by melting snow. They had a little tea still left, no sugar, a little tobacco, and a somewhat stinted supply of the hard greenish substance which the Jew contractor called bread. For the one hundred and fifty soldiers, there were exactly twenty-four sheepskins. Some of the men managed to lead a half-frozen existence in the single summer tents, now tattered and torn with hard usage, others burrowed holes for themselves in the snow, snow-palaces the poor fellows jocularly called them. They built snow sheds for the few wretched horses still alive, and fed them with insufficient rations of chopped straw and those fragments of the green compound which human throats could not swallow.

One hundred and twenty of the men had been badly frost-bitten on toes, and hands, and faces. Over one hundred continued to groan night and day with rheumatism in one or other of its forms. All day and all night long there was a perpetual coughing, and spitting, and rubbing of trembling hands and stiffening joints with snow. The thermometer had stood for a fortnight at thirty-five degrees below zero, and a terrific gale continued to blow from the north without cessation. Once or twice a day, but only for a few minutes at a time, the sun struggled forth from the hurtling clouds that swept over the mountains, but there was no warmth in its sickly rays. The air was perpetually filled with fine drifting snow that struck sharp as a knife against the face. Such was the camp in the defile of Plitchenti.

It was here with the tremendous strain which they had to bear that the hitherto loosely knit warp and woof of Sergei's sentiments and ideas hardened into the compacted closeness of character. His loneliness and remoteness threw him in on himself, not only in his conduct of the grave responsibilities that rested upon him in the defence of the pass, and the unremitting attention which the physical attention of his men demanded, but also in the performance of a duty which he was fast learning to place beyond all others in urgency and importance, the spiritual growth of his own nature and of those over whom he exercised influence and authority. With the fluctuations and struggles of those terrible months in the Balkans, there went the continuous inner spiritual trial and struggle which he passed through, annealing his mind and spirit to their highest temper, and giving reality and force to his ideas. The great truths which Mikhail had taught him were filtering down into his soul after long and quiet contemplation. Face to face with the dread scenes of war, realizing as he had never realized before the uncertainties of life, he grew humble and pure, and never one tyrannical, or morose, or hopeless word escaped him. Mikhail, we know, had written to his friend Vassily, that Sergei's troopers adored him. It was quite true, and now amidst the terrors of their critical position, with hourly evidences of his devotion and self-sacrifice before them, of his never-failing good temper and comradeship, as well as his plentitude of resource, their devotion to him grew to have no bounds.

Next to Sergei, by far the most important member of the little company was Mikhail. Poor fellow, he had had a miserable time of it. No sooner did the extreme cold weather commence than he began to be racked with rheumatism. When he recovered a little, it was only to fall a victim to typhus. Sergei, and every man of the detachment who was not himself ill, was devoted to the poor preacher. The best skill of the field apothecary, a gallant young German from a pleasant colony in Kherson, who died in battle on the Maritza horribly wounded, and whose dying breath was a prayer for the Czar and his armies, was exerted on his behalf. Great rough fellows used to relieve one another noiselessly at his lowly bedside, and sit beside him with his hot hand in theirs, watching his glazed eyes for returning consciousness.

They all loved Mikhail with a love second only to that for which they felt for their commander. Each individual of them had come into close contact with the gentle and godly peasant of Slavo, and had heard from him the great message and the tender invitation. In the paroxysms of his fever the little hut would be filled by the rough northern dragoons in their long grey tattered overcoats, weeping like children. The camp gave up firing for a whole week that Mikhail's hut might be warm, and his bed was made softer by coats that their owners could ill spare. How they banked up the snow round the hut to keep out the icy draughts! For many a year after, Mikhail used to tell with a tear and a smile the story of how one of them knocked over a frozen bustard in the snow, and how it was roasted and boiled and made soup of, and again roasted and boiled, for his exclusive use.

A considerable spell of fine clear weather a little after Christmas, had improved matters somewhat in the Plitchenti gorge. The sun shone pleasantly on the snow around them, and the peaks of the mountains at the head of the defile glistened in the strong light. The road between the little outlying camp and the main body in the Shipka, thirty miles away, was open, and communication between the two had again become possible. The hard frost that still prevailed was the only serious drawback that the brave fellows in the gorge felt to perfect contentedness.

Early one morning they were all out of doors engaged in rough games that only the extreme cold made possible, when a sentry cried out that two mounted men were slowly making their way down the pass from the Shipka. At once every one was alert. These were the first messengers from headquarters for a fortnight. Anything might happen now. There would be dispatches to Captain Sergei, the men thought, and some move was expected that must surely vary the monotony of their existence.

They were right. There was to be no more monotony.

Down came the riders plunging through the snow. Sergei stood forward to receive them. They were bearers of two letters, one of them for Mikhail from Slavo, the other dressed under cover to Sergei, the other a dispatch from the general in command. Sergei tore off the envelope and rapidly read through his orders. Mikhail retired to his hut to pore over a long epistle of detail from his old friend Vassily. In a few minutes he was joined by Sergei looking pale and thoughtful. The troopers stood around Mikhail watching him read his letter, smiling when he smiled, looking serious when Mikhail's face showed as some important matter was being perused, shuffled awkwardly out of the hut at the entrance of their officer, turning over one another at the door. They knew that the captain and Mikhail came from the same Ukraine village, and the instinctively felt that they wished to be alone over that letter.

"Let me have the news, Misha. How is Vassily? How are they all?"

Mikhail handed him the letter, and Sergei hastily skimmed its closely-pencilled pages looking for something, for a name that he felt must be mentioned in it somewhere. He found it at last. Vassily's news ran thus: "The German overseer from Krasnaya Balka was over here the other day. He says the Countess left her home soon after war was declared, and that he has not seen her since. He knows this because he heard sometimes when she wanted certain matters attended to. He was in Kief the autumn, and they told him that Olga Alexlovna had gone away to Bulgaria as a hospital nurse, taking with her a young lady to whom she seemed much attached and who had been living with her for some months."

Sergei read these few words again and again, and his heart filled with the strongest, most conflicting emotions—infinite love for the noble woman who had devoted herself to assuage the pain and misery of the helpless wounded, and fear that the frail woman, nurtured in refinement, would break down under the self-imposed strain, would herself incur one of the terrible plagues of disease that scourge the army worse than the bayonets and lances of the Turks.

He handed the letter back to Mikhail without reading any more of it. Just of the narrative of events at Slavo the Mikhail now began to pour forth fell unheeding ears. Sergei heard about the disappearance of the Sozontieffs—to Mikhail most inexplicable news—about the trials and worries that the Stundists suffered, about Grisha being often up at the house and the General's almost constant companion, about all the little details of village life; but his thoughts dwelt alone on the true woman whom he loved, and everything else passed by him unheeded. He rose and went to his own tent telling Mikhail that next day he would have a long talk with him, and that the returning troopers would take back any letter that he might wish to write. That long talk, however, they never had.

Once in his tent Sergei became the man of action. The dispatch from the general commanding was pulled out of his pocket, and a map of the district was unrolled on his little camp table and closely studied. Again he read the dispatch. It was short, concise, peremptory—"To Captain Vassilhin in charge of the detachment in the Plitchenti Pass.—Intelligence is just in that on Wednesday morning before daybreak a body of the enemy's irregular cavalry will endeavor to push up one of the defiles either east or west of you. Keep sharp look-out, and should you hear of anything of importance send your fastest messenger with the news. Should they attempt Plitchenti hold the place to the last. The enemy are three hundred strong. Reinforcements will reach you Wednesday midday."

"This will be a tough job," said Sergei as he turned over the situation in his mind. "They will of course try to force their way up the Plitchenti." Then his voice, "Send Sergeant Borisoff here.

REJECTING CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for Week Beginning Nov. 17th. Matthew 10: 11-15, 32, 33.

THE consequences of rejecting Christ reach far out beyond the measurement of human conception. Of their character and their fearful effect we have only dim, vague ideas; but those are sufficient to arouse the saddest apprehension. We are told that there remaineth no sacrifice, implying that in the gift of Christ God has done all even he can do for the redemption of man. Indeed it would be impossible for us to conceive in this finite state of anything beyond this supreme sacrifice that could be made. The man who, knowing what Christ is, why he came, and what he suffered to accomplish—a man who, knowing all these, deliberately rejects him, could not be brought to God by anything short of force, and that God will not use. One consequence, therefore, of rejecting Christ is to put the man who rejects him beyond hope. There is no gronnd for hoping that he will ever be other than what he is — separated from God and all that makes for righteousness. In whatever part of God's universe he may be there must be between him and God's children "a great gulf fixed."

Such a consequence is reasonable. Every one has had at some time the unhappiness of witnessing the alienation between a good man and a bad one. The father striving to reclaim his boy, lavishing love and kindness upon him, trying to draw him away from evil, by entreaties, persuasions, and warnings, feels that he cannot save him up. The boy on his part is deceiving his father, choosing the vile and depraved for his companions, paying no heed to warning but going persistently and recklessly downward until at last the limits of his father's patience even when he has not reach the limits of his love. Friends and relatives are astonished at the father's long-suffering, and feel that it is being wasted—that the boy is "a hopeless case." If then the father unsolicited, spontaneously makes some sacrifice for the boy's sake—if he gives up his home and beggars himself to pay his son's debts and give him a new start in the world; or if he sacrifices some treasured possession, such as a library which he has been collecting all his life and in which he finds his chief pleasure and delight, for the benefit of the wretched disgrace; or if he takes the money he had invested to support a beloved daughter after his death, and leaving her without resource, gives all the hoard to his rebellious boy to save him from disgrace and punishment—if after such a sacrifice as any of these, the boy is still callous, indifferent and unchanged, what hope is there for him? Is there not some conceivable limit that he may reach at which his father might be justified in refusing to do anything more for him? Whatever that limit may be, it falls short of what God did in giving his only begotten Son for the redemption of the world. If then that sacrifice is wasted in any individual case, can we wonder if God should leave such a person to the natural consequences of his own wickedness?

There is no need to speculate as to the details of such a fate. Who that has seen the poverty, friendlessness, disease and misery of a wicked, dissolute old man does not dread such a fate? No one may have injured him. There was no reason why even his worst enemy should have troubled himself to do so. His own appetites and propensities would carry their own retribution. Wild oats bear their own crop. Sin must inevitably lead to misery by its own nature and what we see in the end of a life of sin is a hint of what there must be in the life lengthened out into eternity.

CHRIST'S WORK IN NEW GUINEA.

Rev. James Chalmers, the well-known Presbyterian missionary to the South Sea Islands, has had a most wonderful experience in that field. After some preliminary labors and early difficulties on Suan, or Stacey Island, and the mainland, he began his long and perilous journeys, accompanied only by his brave wife, among tribes supposed to be hostile, traveling unarmed, trusting in God's protection, in whose work he rejoiced to be engaged. He says: "Only once in New Guinea have I carried a weapon, and then we had spears thrown at us." Mrs. Chalmers had the happy art of drawing the savages to her, and of inspiring them with confidence in her and her husband. She seemed absolutely fearless, and made the wild children of nature who surrounded her greatly respect and later on love her. A singular, and by no means pleasant, instance of this is given by Mr. Chalmers:

He says: "We were once invited to a cannibal feast about a mile and a half away. When I asked how many people were to be eaten, I was told five men. As there were exactly five of us, I wondered whether we were to supply the materials of the feast. We did not go. In the evening I was standing at the door of our house, and my wife sitting just inside, when a fine old savage came up and put down a small basket in front of Mrs. Chalmers. I asked him to open it. 'It is not for you,' he said, 'it is for my daughter,' meaning Mrs. Chalmers. At length he opened the basket. It contained a man's breast, which he had secured as a tid-bit for Mrs. Chalmers. I thanked him for his kindness, but explained that we did not eat that kind of food. He seemed very disappointed, but we gave him a small present, and talked to him seriously, saying that we hoped that would be the last time he would eat human flesh: and I believe it was."

One night, after all in the village had retired to rest, a peculiar noise was heard, as of some one in great distress; then came loud speaking, in a falsetto voice, and all knew at once that a spiritist, or sorcerer, was near by, and revelations were about to be made. The traveling party were all named, and the places they were to visit. Mr. Chalmers felt anxious, for if the "revelation" should be the least doubtful, no native would accompany them. However, it turned out all right. The "spirit" gave the missionaries an excellent character, eulogized them as good and kind, and predicted that all the villages would willingly receive them. Of course the "spiritist" sorcerer had previously ascertained the intentions of Mr. Chalmers, and, being favorably impressed by him, spoke in his favor.

Along the coast of New Guinea mission stations have been planted by Mr. Chalmers, who has obtained the name of "Tatmate" (teacher), and is beloved by all.

THE LAST TIMES.

The Programme Outlined in Prophecy of Events at the Close of this Dispensation.

THE picture outlined in prophecy of the events of the last days includes besides the three already mentioned—The general confusion and rumors of war: the conversion of many Jews and Gentiles and appearing of Antichrist—a sketch of:

4. The kingdom of Antichrist. (II. Thessalonians 2, 3, 4; Revelation 12 throughout). His subjects will be the many who have revolted from Christianity. He will raise himself above all that is called God, or that is divine. Also he will sit in the temple of God, giving himself out that he is God. He will open his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name and tabernacle, and them that dwell in Heaven. It will be given him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them. A false prophet will be his most intimate partisan, who, by great craft and lying wonders, will seduce men to submission under him. At first he will appear in some connection with corrupt Christianity, though at the same time he will hate it (Rev. 17: 3—16:) but he will soon manifest his resentment against all who even nominally profess Christianity, and destroy them. They will be at first useful to his purpose, but when he has reached his elevation he will destroy those who have helped to raise him to it. His kingdom will, however, be visited by many public calamities. (Rev. 16: 1—21.)

5. Signs of the Son of Man. (Matt. 24: 30; Rev. 14: 14.) Notwithstanding the great dangers to which they shall be exposed, Christians will not be terrified: for they will see the sign of the Son of Man in the clouds. What this sign which immediately precedes his coming is to be, we cannot positively determine, but it is sufficient for us to know that it will be really visible to all, and so manifest, that there will be no room for any to doubt the reality of the fact. (Matt. 24: 27.)

6. The second visible manifestation of Jesus. (Matt. 24: 30; Acts 1: 6, 7: 3: 19—21; Heb. 9: 28; Rev. 19: 11—21.) In the moment of greatest danger, when human help is impossible, when the enemy believes he can blot out Christianity, the Lord will appear for the deliverance of his Church. Now sorrow and anguish disappear; the time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord is come. He appears visibly on the clouds of heaven, as the Son of Man in his glorified body, and accompanied by his saints. To be sure the design of his thus coming will not be the last judgment of the world, but the deliverance and completion of his church. Meanwhile the nature of the matter brings with it preliminary subordinate judgment, also with the appearance of the Lord will take place the first resurrection, the transformation of the pious and the renovation of the earth.

7. The first resurrection, or resurrection of the saints. (Matt. 24: 31; John 5: 29; 6: 39; Luke 20: 36; 1 Cor. 15: 23; Philip. 2 11; 1 Thess. 4: 16; Rev. 24: 4.) According to these passages, the saints then dead, at the personal appearance of Christ, are to be organized again with material bodies. This is to take place a thousand years before the awakening of the other dead, the wicked. And this first resurrection is to include such as shall have been put to death for the testimony of Jesus and his Word, and who have not taken upon them the mark of the beast or his image: all such are to appear again upon the earth, and to live and reign with Christ for a thousand years. Happily the saints who have a part in the first resurrection, over them death has no power: but they shall be priests of God and Christ, and reign with him a thousand years.

THE WONDERFUL LAMP.

An Address Delivered by Rev. Alexander Macleod, D.D. Text: Psalm 119: 105, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet and a light unto my path."

ONE of the most famous stories in the world is about a lamp. I was as young as you when I first heard it. And to-day, speaking to you here, it all comes back to me. Aladdin, the ragged orphan boy, his poor hard-working mother, the magician selling his wares on the street, and the wonderful lamp! One thing I well remember, that like every other good thing, it had to be brought up out of a deep place, and when it was found, it was, to look at it, nothing but an old and common everyday lamp. And who that has once read the story, can ever forget how the poor mother, rubbing it one day with sand to make it look bright, found out what sort of lamp it was, and what it could do for her boy and her? It was a fortune to them. It gave them everything they wished. It brought food, clothes, money, and servants to Aladdin and his mother. It built houses for them; brought them horses and carriages; made friends for them; put enemies away from them. And it opened to Aladdin the gates of the king's palace, made him a king's son, and at last a king.

I remember, after I first heard the story, how I used to sit at the fireside and look at the coals burning in the grate, and at the flames turning and twisting about the bars, and far in among the flames and the glowing coals, at the strange houses, and fields, and trees, and faces, which boys are always seeing in the fire, and how I said to myself: "Oh, for one other such lamp as Aladdin's, for a lamp that would make a king of me, or carry me like a bird over all the wonderful places of the earth!"

Boys' Wishes.

And I daresay many another boy has been as simple as I, and wished the same wish. I would not be surprised if there should be boys before me who have read the story, and wished that wish in the long winter evenings as they sit by the fire. I am sure there is many an intelligent boy not so well off as you are, who has to rise early in the morning, and go through the dark, cold lanes to some factory, who has said to himself: "Oh, for a lamp like Aladdin's, to put all this darkness and cold away, and bring the factory a little nearer, and give me a little time for school, and warm clothes, and a better dinner when I go home!"

And that is not such a foolish wish as many people might suppose. It is not a mere dream, or a thing only to be found in a story. The Bible tells us of a lamp that will do for you all that Aladdin's did for him, and more.—a lamp which has been lighted in heaven, and sent down to earth, which has light for hearts, and homes, and churches; and something better than gold or silver, or houses and lands, or coaches and horses for ourselves; which every boy and girl already have. This is that lamp about which prophets and apostles so often speak,—the wonder-working lamp of truth and life, which shines in the Word of God.

Of the many wonders of this lamp I intend at present to speak only of one. And it is among the lowliest of them all. It is the wonder mentioned by King David in one of his Psalms:—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet."

But I must first explain:—How a Word can be a lamp to one's feet.

It would take too long to tell you of all the paths for which God's Word is a lamp. But I will mention these few. There is that first path of life, which in the Book of Proverbs is called "the highway of the upright"—the path of departing from evil. There is the path of our common duties, which both old and young have to tread daily. And there is the last sad path, we must one day all take, through the valley of the shadow of death. I will try at present to show you how, for the first and second of these, God's Word is a lamp to the feet.

Our Lord told a story, which far better than any I could tell, shows how this Word can be a lamp to guide a soul out from an evil way.

There was once a silly young man who wandered a great way from home. He had been so long from home, that the clothes, which were good when he left, were worn into mere rags. At home he was a prince; where he now was, he was a slave. He lived in a perfect wilderness, with no creatures beside him but swine. And he saw all his folly in leaving home, and he saw that he was nothing now but a poor, despised, lonely swineherd. "Oh," he said to himself, "why did I ever come into this desolate land? Why did I ever leave the land of my birth?" Well, one day, when and tears were running down his cheeks, the Spirit of Christ whispered into his soul that father was still alive. And he said to himself: "My father! my father! in whose house there is bread enought and to spare?" My father! he said again. That word kept shining in all his thoughts, and growing clearer and clearer, until at last it burned within him like a light, and it became a lamp to him, and the light of it fell forward, and made a bright path to him. And he arose and followed it, and it brought him to his father's house, and to bread and love and life once more.

Two young men were one day looking earnestly at a large factory in a certain town. They had come hundreds of miles to see it, and to get into it. There was a secret there which they wanted to find out—a machine which a clever man had invented, which was doing work nothing else could do so well. And these young men had resolved to obtain a sight of this machine, and find out its secret, and make drawings of it, and then come home and make a similar machine for themselves. And their plan was this: They put aside their fine clothes and put on the clothes of mechanics, and in that dress meant to ask for work in this factory, and work until they found out the secret. But they had just arrived, and they did not mean to apply till the next day.

One of the young men had the habit of reading a chapter of the Bible every morning. And the next day the chapter happened to be that one in Exodus, where the Ten Commandments are. He had read it many times, and always to the end; but this morning, when he got to the Eighth Commandment, he could not go further. A great light flashed up from it and smote his conscience. Right up it came out of the words, "Thou shalt not steal!" He read them again, and every word seemed to kindle into fire, "Thou shalt not steal." He laid the Bible on his knee, and took himself to task. "Is it not stealing I have come here to do? I have come all this weary way to search out and try to make it my own by stealing it." His agitation was very great. But he turned to his companion and said: "What we have come here to do, if we do it, will be theft—theft of another man's thought, and skill, and honor, and bread." Then he took up the Bible again and opened it in the gospel of Matthew, and read: "All whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." And he said, if this machine were ours, if we had spent years inventing it, and had succeeded in getting it to work, would we think it right if some stranger were to steal into our factory on a false pretence and rob us of the fruits of our labor?"

His companion was angry at first. But by-and-by he acknowledged that it would be wrong. And they came back to their home without the secret. God's word was a lamp to their feet to helpt hem to depart from that evil.

I am afraid you will think my next two stories not worth the telling, but I like them myself. They are stories to show how God's word is a lamp for the path of our common everyday duties.

James Ankerton had got into a very good office in a big city. One day, when he had been some months at work, his master said to him, "Ankerton, take this money to the bank." And he gave him a bag with a thousand sovereigns. The boy never had so much money in his hands before. And it was the very first time he was sent to the bank. Now James Ankerton had been an honest boy all his days; but he was only a boy, and, having all this money in his hand, certain strange thoughts came into his mind, and among them these: "I wonder if I shall ever have a thousand pounds of my own. If I ever have, what a rich fellow I shall be! A thousand pounds! If I had half as much, or quarter as much, wouldn't I send a silk gown to my mother, and a velvet jacket to my sister Jane! And I would have coffee every day for lunch along with my dry bread." By this time he found himself at the bank, and that put an end to his fine thoughts. So he lodged the money, and came straight as an arrow back to his work.

The Path to the Bank.

And is that all? Yes, that is all. That is my story. He was sent to the bank with his master's money, and he went. And it never came into his mind, nor near his mind, nor within, I will say, a thousand miles of his mind, that he might buy the gown, or the jacket, or the coffee with his master's money. Never! He was a boy who read his Bible daily. And the light of the Bible was in every thought he had. And when he was sent with his master's money to the bank, that light was as a lamp going before him to the bank counter, and it goes before hundreds and thousands of honest boys in this country when they are entrusted, as James Ankerton was, with money not their own.

The next I have to speak about, to whose feet God's word was a lamp, was a little servant girl; and I only wish all the young ladies who hear me would take her for an example.

I don't need to tell any grown up person, but perhaps it has never occurred to you young people, that the roads a servant girl has to travel are very common roads—from the nursery to the parlor, from the parlor to the kitchen, up-stairs, down-stairs, into sick-room and play-room,—very common roads indeed! But for all that, God's Word has been given to guide the steps of those who have to walk in them.

Charlotte was an angel in the house where she served. She went about her work so quietly that you would not know she was moving at all. If any one were sick, she was the kindest, helpfullest person in all the house. If any one was cross she knew how to speak, and how to be silent, so as to put the crossness away. If anybody was discontented, Charlotte's content made them ashamed of themselves. The children loved her, and well they might. She had good words and kind words for them all. And withal she was tidy, and thoughtful, and true.

A Household Light.

There never was a girl of her age—and she was only fourteen—who walked more habitually and truly in the way of Christian life. And this was the secret of it,—she walked by the light of God's lamp. Her teacher was one who took great pains with her class, and tried to find out the disposition of each scholar. And she found out Charlotte's. And then she searched out a chapter fitting her disposition and said, "Now, Charlotte, you will read that chapter, and think over some part of it every day." It was the chapter in Corinthians about charity. And Charlotte read that chapter three times a day; and it was a lamp to her feet.

Day by day she consulted her lamp, and hid the light of it in her heart, and from thence it would stream out, and show her paths of meekness, goodness, and gentleness to travel in.

Charlotte is grown to be a young woman. I try sometimes to look into the future, and I see her, old and feeble, and dying, and buried out of view. But always I think, when that sad vision comes up, that her lamp will never be old—never be buried. "Charity never faileth." And her charity, I am sure, will pass on, when she dies, and burn among the lamps that burn before the throne of God.

God's word is a lamp for the common, every-day roads of life. But it is more than that: it is a lamp for every road we can take. And it is a lamp for that most difficult of the soul's roads—the road through the valley of the shadow of death.

Our Christian Workers.

ELD. F. C. RENNER.

THE fear is often expressed that the expectation of Christ's Second Coming has a tendency to discourage effort to save souls. The life of Mr. F. C. Renner whose portrait appears in this colume is another of the many illustrations of the groundlessness of such fear. Mr. Renner is an earnest student of prophecy and like all other students he sees in the events around him condition corresponding to that which Christ and the apostles and prophets de scribed when they sketched the events the last days of this dispensation. Renner is one of those who watch a wait for the Coming of the Lord; yet is one of the earnest workers, too. F more than twenty-seven years his ch business has been the winning of souls Christ. Without fee or reward he l toiled for his Master, content with t wages that Master gives to all who se him in sincerity and in truth—the joy o mind at peace and the hope of hearing the last the "Well done, good and faith servant, enter thou into the joy of t Lord."

Mr. Renner's home is New Midway, M and there he finds his work. In the stu of the Bible, in the preparation of artic on prophecy, and in personal efforts reach souls who are outside the Church ganizations, he spends all the time at disposal. He is now fifty-five years of a and he is not less but more earnest in work than he was when he was thir The old Book is dearer to him now tl ever, and so far is he from regarding it exhausted, that there seems daily to b larger area to explore and new depths sound. Scholarship has done much us in shedding light on the difficulties God's Word, but in grasping the dee spiritual mysteries, it is as true now a was in Christ's time, that God has hid these things from the wise and prude and has revealed them unto babes.

A DESCENDANT OF SOLOMON.

News has been received of the death by lightning stroke, of King Menelek II., of Abyssinia. He was one of the most picturesque of African rulers, and the story of his life reads like a romance. Fifty-five years ago, Haelon, then king of Shoa, was told that a beggar woman of wondrous beauty stood at his palace gates. He sent for her and took her as his wife. When a son was born, although Haelon had other sons, the newcomer was hailed as his heir, and when Haelon died, Menelek became king. He claimed to be lineally descended from King Solomon of Israel.

When King John of Abyssinia was killed in 1889, Menelek proclaimed himself king of Abyssinia, and thereafter that country passed under his rule. He was an intelligent and progressive monarch, and had many Enropeans among his advisers. He was exceedingly fond of machinery and introduced many modern ideas in his kingdom. He employed Swiss engineers to design buildings and bridges and Swiss workmen to teach his subjects masonwork, carpentry, and other useful crafts. When Italy assumed a protectorate over his kingdom, his power and influence declined and he vainly attempted to abrogate the treaties he had made. Now that he is dead, Abyssinia will probably soon pass under Italian control. It is a rich mineral country, with a splendid, healthful climate, and Europeans can live there free from the climatic troubles that are common to white men in other parts of Africa.

Missionaries have made comparatively slow progress in Abyssinia, owing largely to the opposition of Menelek himself. In 1885, he imprisoned two Swedish missionaries, and a year or two afterward expelled all the French and German missionaries from his territory. His death may open the way for a resumption of Christian work, for which there is much need among the ignorant and superstitious natives.

Arabia and the Gospel.

Dr Bent's Explorations in the Ancient Frankincense Country.

THE Turk has sway in the Euphrates Valley, north, Hedjaz and Yemen, westward, and east, at El Hasa. Central Arabia is held by the Wahabees, and independent tribes occupy El Shamma Hamad, Oman and Dahna. Across the interior sweep mountainous ranges attaining altitudes of 9,000 feet, between which lie vast plains rising from 2,000 to 4,000 feet above the sea level. The valley region, peopled by fanatical Moslem Wahabees and Turks, writes Rev. James Johnston in The Church at Home and Abroad, offers scanty encouragement, at present, for missionary enterprise. Southward lies a stupendous belt of desert, little explored, divided by lofty mountain chains and summit and inhabited by the Dahna tribes. Though the natives are quite isolated, they are by no means bigoted, and being free from Turkish control, they are more open to spiritual light. To these regions Mr. Theodore Bent and his heroic wife are the latest visitors. He made his way to Dhofar, the ancient frankincense country, 640 miles by sea from Muscat. Oman, of which Muscat is the capital, is nominally ruled by the Sultan of Oman, who, however, has no real sovereignty outside his capital and its surroundings. To the west of Muscat live a number of lawless tribes, the chief of which is the Jenefa, slave traders and looters of shipwrecked vessels. More westerly rolls the desert of Oman, connecting the arid wastes of Central Arabia directly with the Indian Ocean, whose crossing is dreaded even by the Arabs themselves.

Dhofar, the theatre of Mr. Bent's exploit, is nominally under the Sultan of Muscat, but subject to Wali Suleiman, a man of iron will, having the allegiance of the Bedouins. This Arab gave great hospitality to the traveller in his palace at Al Hafa, by the coast, and furnished an escort for the route. Mr. Bent traversed the ruins in many directions between Risout and Merbaf, alighting on the sites of nine ruins of towns of considerable extent at seven different points.

The principal ruins are by the sea, enclosing an acropolis 100 feet high, and a harbor, connected with the ocean. Mohammedan mosques in ruins cover the ground and still more ancient Sabæan temples represented by square columns with flutings at the four corners and step-like capitals. The traveller, it is said, will regard this, the ancient capital of the frankincense country, as the Manteion Artemidos of Claudius Ptolemy, the name obviously a Greek translation of the Sabæan for a famous oracle which existed here, not far, as Ptolemy says, from Risout. In the Wadi Dawkah, twelve miles from Al Hafa, fresh ruins of a Sabæan town were found, and associated with the Addites, a long bygone race. More important was the discovery of the remains of an extensive town at Khor Rori, second only to those of the capital at Balad, and lying twenty miles west of it. By overwhelming evidence this is recognized as the Mirbat of antiquity with its continuous harbor afforded anchorage for the ships visiting Dhofar in the frankincense trade. A journey was made to the confines of the distant Ejedesert in the company of a strange Bedawi tribe. Half naked, with long, unkempt hair tied down with a leather thong, each of these wild creatures carried a buckler of iron shield and spear and an iron sword. Showing the travellers everywhere yet preserving an independent attitude they were susceptible only to the magical contents of the medicine chest. The Gara type to the Hadramaut Bedouin is distinct in language, the Gara were tall and active and of finely cut features. They are an evil occupying huts save when encamped in the valleys with their flocks their home is usually a cave or beneath a tree.

The Gara women were exceedingly shy and fled if approached. They were seen to wear poor jewelry consisting of silver necklaces, armlets, nose and toe rings. Their eyebrows were joined with antimony, and a black sticky substance was affixed to the nose and forehead. Small in form they do not cover their faces, and wear a light clothing of dark blue homespun cotton. The frankincense trees were visited on the Dhofar coast each of which bears its owner's name. They are described as having bright, green leaves, small green flowers, and insignificant fruit. In the hot weather of summer, the stems are cut and the exuding gum collected and sold wholesale to the amount of 9,000 cwts. annually to Canyan merchants.

To this mysterious country of some ten million of people the ensigns of the American-Arabia Mission and the Free Church of Scotland have gone forth to write, if God wills, a heroic page in the missionary history of Arabia.

A CONSECRATED SHUT-IN.

What one woman, feeble in health, can do to save souls is exemplified in the career of Sarah Robinson, of Portsmouth, England. Twenty-five years ago the verdict of her London doctor was a couch for the greater part of her life. Hearing this, she "went to the Lord with it and made one definite request—That my complaint might never hinder my working, whether my life were long or short. I promised Him that, by His grace, I would not repine at pain or ugliness, if only I might work without interruption." From that day to this, notwithstanding her spinal weakness, she has by personal energy and influence carried out her plans in successful temperance work among soldiers. Her motto was Ready, adhered to through many misgivings as to her power for effectual service. Large mission buildings, soldiers' homes, and coffee houses in three seaports stand as one phase of the results.

Christian Work in Chicago.

The University Settlement Near the Stock-yards and Its Philanthropic Efforts.

SOMEONE has written that, notwithstanding its wickedness, there is more Christian effort put forth in Chicago in various lines of work than in any Western city. A recent article in The Kingdom gives some interesting facts connected with one phase of Christian work there:

The University of Chicago Settlement, 4655 Gross avenue, near the Union Stock yards, is the outcome of work done by the Philanthropic Committee in 1893. A thorough examination of the whole region about the Stock Yards was made as to nationality, habits, morals, poverty, schools, churches, saloons, and the like. As a result of this inquiry, a site was chosen, past which 200 workmen pass in five minutes. Little existed to stimulate the social life and civic conscience of that part of the city. The saloons held full sway. Into such conditions it was proposed to introduce an institution, in the nature of a club, under the guidance and official recognition of the University, which would create a centre of cultivation and refinement and give instruction and help in countless directions. The intellectual and moral resources of the University could be brought to the quickening of life in districts greatly in need of them. While entirely undenominational the work must necessarily be deeply and broadly religious. A great variety of nationalities and beliefs are represented in the people of the district, and all are welcomed. All meet on the basis of a desire that all creeds, all political beliefs, and all nationalities should be brought together to work for the good of each. The work carried on can only be outlined. In September, 1894, Miss Mary E. McDowell was appointed head resident in direct charge of the settlement. The financial and general control is vested in a permanent Settlement board, of which Professor J. Laurence Laughlin is chairman. A creche with model equipment, open every day, is supported by a group of ladies on the South Side. The kindergarten, opened last year under Mrs. Page of the Kindergarten Institute, was so eagerly welcomed that great numbers of children had to be turned away. It is still growing.

A store on Ashland avenue was rented to be used for the kindergarten. Here a chorus of 150 children assemble every Tuesday afternoon under the leadership of Miss Marie Hofer. This hall allows the meeting of a sewing class of 150 girls every Wednesday; and concerts of classical music are given. Monday evenings the Settlement cadets drill here, closing with a "camp-fire."

The two-story brick house, 4655 Gross avenue, furnishes the quarters quite inadequate for the work which has to be done. Instruction and cultivation of social life appear in the various clubs. Instructors from the University give freely of their time. The Banyan Club of young women give support to the residents, and Tuesday evenings have formed a class in English literature. The Civic Club of young men have been also useful and now receive addresses from prominent citizens. Classes in music and drawing have been formed. An Agassiz Chapter for boys started a surprising interest in natural science, leading to summer excursions into the country. From the circulating libraries of the Children's Aid Society has grown the system of home libraries. Every Friday night there is a physical culture class for young women.

The most helpful interest in the Settlement has been shown by the members of the University in all its ranks. The future of the settlement seem to be assured.

An Asthma Cure at Last

THE RED CROSS IN CHINA.

Dr. Boudinot C. Atterbury, now stationed at Tientsin, China, in a recent letter gives these interesting facts concerning the progress of the Red Cross work in that country:

The Red Cross work, besides affording foreigners a fine opportunity to show practical sympathy with the suffering Chinese, has also stirred up some of the higher native officials to take an interest in their own soldiers. Many of the soldiers are most superstitious, and have great faith in the power of charms to heal their wounds. One General, with his arm shattered by a ball, thinking the daily dressing too slow a method of cure, called in a fortune teller. This charmer wrote some prayers on a piece of red paper; this was burned and its ashes were made into a medicine, which was taken for four days. During this time the wound was not looked after, and the too-superstitious General died from blood-poisoning before the paper-prayer-medicine had a chance to work properly. These men also believe most thoroughly in a certain plaster, which has not only power to draw out the bullet, but will also heal the wound without any after-deformity. On the other hand, several more intelligent Mandarins, seeing for themselves the superiority of western surgery, have asked to have foreign trained men located in their camps, promising all necessary money for the hospitals. I have seen Viceroy Li several times since his return from Japan after signing the treaty of peace. The Viceroy is still the only official in China who appreciates and understands western civilization. The wound in his cheek has healed, leaving only a small dimple where the ball entered.

A SIMPLE DEMONSTRATION.

A LITTLE anecdote is related by way of illustrating the false attitude of a certain class of people who, from their own superficial standpoint, undertake the task of criticising the Bible. A gentleman had been talking with an elderly Scotchman about miracles. The latter reverently observed:

"I dinna ken, what God may do, or wi' he winna do, but I don't regard a miracle to be a violation o'the laws o' nature. There is no violation o' the laws o' God that I ken' o', save the wicked actions o' wicked men."

"And what then, do you make a miracle to be?"

"I regard it, to be merely such an interference wi' the established course o' things as infallibly shows us the presence and action o' the supernatural power. What o'clock is it wi' you, sir, if you please?"

"It's half past twelve, exactly—Greenwich time," replied the other.

"Vell, sir," said the old man, pulling an ancient time-piece from his pocket, "it's one o'clock wi' me; I generally keep my watch a bit forrit (a little forward.) But I may have a special reason the noo for setting my watch by the railway; and so, ye see, I'm taming the hand o't round. Now wad ye 'say that I had violated the law o' a watch? True, I have done wi' watchdom wi' a' its laws couldna hae done for itsel', but I hae done violence to nae o' its laws. Ma action is only the interference o' a superior intelligence for a simple end, but I hae suspended no law. We then, instead o' the watch, say the universe; instead o' moving the hands, sayiod acting worthily o' himself, and we ae a' that I contend for a miracle: that's, the unquestionable presence of the Almighty hand working the divine will. And if he sees fit to work miracles what can hinder him? He has done it oftener than once or twice already; and who daur saye'll not get leave to do it again?"

MORE CHINESE OUTRAGES.

In a recent letter from Bing-Yae, in South-eastern Cheh-Kiary, to "China's Millions," the organ of the China Inland Mission, Mr. Menzies writes: Many of our native converts have been despoiled of everything they had. One of them named 'Oa was compelled to fly for his life. It appears that for some time previous the people had been much disturbed through finding that the eyes had been taken out of some of the idols; and now, after being held in one of the temples, the question arose as to who could have perpetrated the outrage. One man said that it was doubtless the man, Oa, he held the only one who believed in the foreign doctrine." This man, with two others, immediately taxed Mr. 'Oa with it. He and his son both protested their innocence and ignorance as to the pulpit. Notwithstanding, they beat them, and then proceeded to lay hold of the other, with a view to carrying him off to the temple; but he eluded them, and took refuge in the chapel at Shaekoa-u. On the morning of June 29, this chapel was entirely destroyed, and also the houses of five Chinese Christians and that of the evangelist. The rioters then went to Whu-din, about four and a-half miles distant, and utterly demolished and burnt the beautiful house of Mr. 'Oa, which had been built six years before, and also three more houses.

On the following Sunday morning they renewed the attack, rendering six more Christians homeless during that day. On Monday they went to the Koa-no district, and attacked the houses of two families of Christians in a place called Koa-dza. In one case, every article of furniture and household use was smashed to atoms; but in the other a few things were secreted and saved from destruction. During the Dragon festival, a boat belonging to 'Oa-ie had been defeated on the 27th, and the rowers attributed it to the eyes having been taken from the idols by the only Christian living in the place. They consequently beat him, and threatened that, in the event of a defeat the next day, they would kill him and his two sons. The mandarin had heard of this matter, and had already sent runners to the place." Mr. Menzies gives other instances of similar proceedings. At first, he "had hopes that the authorities, who had started on Saturday with soldiers for the disturbed district, would have succeeded in restoring order, but was astonished on learning that they had all returned to the city on Sunday evening," without doing anything to restore order.

CLEVER AUSTRIAN WOMEN.

It is only possible to estimate the rate of one's own progress by comparison with others. Nor need such comparisons be invidious, but on the contrary, if they are at all helpful through the hints and suggestions they furnish, they are perfectly proper to be made. There is a growing impression among young girls of respectable American families that there is a loss of dignity in doing anything that has the character of housework or domestic duties. Quite different is the estimate placed upon such work in other parts of the world. There are few ladies who are capable of doing many things better than the Austrian ladies of high birth. Young girls, with titles and fortunes, are sent to famous milliners and dress-makers, where they serve a regular apprenticeship, and remain until perfectly able to cut and make any garment. An Austrian lady that cannot swim, or does not know how to ride a horse well, is an exception. Needlework of every kind, even to the making of lace, is a part of every girl's education. There is no smattering of anything; whether she learns the piano or drawing, she learns it all thoroughly and well.

Australian "Dry-Air" Treatment of Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Laryngitis, Hay Fever, and Whooping Cough.

TRADE BOOTH'S HYOMEI "DRI-AYR" MARK

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs and microbes which cause diseases of the respiratory organs.

The air, thus highly charged with Hyomei, is inhaled through the Pocket Inhaler at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, inexpensive, and gives immediate relief. It stops all spasmodic coughing instantly, clears the voice, expands the lungs, and increases the breathing capacity.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00 (consisting of pocket inhaler, made of dehydrized hard rubber, beautifully polished, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using). If you are still skeptical, send me your address, and my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei does cure.

Are you open to conviction? Consultation and trial treatment free at my office.

DEER PARK PARSONAGE, SMALLWOOD P. O., BALTIMORE, MD., October 7, 1895.

R. T. BOOTH, Esq., New York.

DEAR SIR: I sent you one dollar about ten days ago for one of your pocket inhaler outfits. It came to hand last Friday morning.

Mrs. Honey had been suffering severely for three weeks daily with asthma. As soon as the inhaler came she began using it, and after a few inhalations the asthma ceased, and now (Tuesday) it has not returned. She has had this trouble ever since she was seven years old, and is now forty, and we have spent hundreds of dollars in search of relief, purchasing everything we saw advertised. When you consider all this, I think it is the most remarkable thing that once using the inhaler should remove the trouble entirely.

Very truly yours,
(Rev.) GEORGE W. HONEY.

THE Gospels show on every page Christ's love for human souls. His passion to save the lost revealed itself even on the cross. Yet our Lord was constantly offending the multitudes by his fearless, uncompromising assertion of the truth; and with those who deliberately clung to their sin and consciously lived untruthful lives, he could have no dealings. This is the real explanation of his silence when he stood before men like Annas and Caiaphas, like Herod and Pontius Pilate. It was no mere self-resraint. He had absolutely nothing in common with these men. The whole atmosphere in which they lived was so false and artificial and foreign to him that he could not speak.

This is a side of Christ's character which is lost sight of in these days when the world is taking upon itself the office of preaching a Gospel of love. Christ never sacrificed divine justice to divine mercy.

Where, in all the writings of the Old Testament, prophets, do we find warnings more austere than these words of the Sermon on the Mount: "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees ye shall, in no case, enter into the kingdom of heaven;" or this charge regarding sin: "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, for it is better for thee to enter into the kingdom of God with one eye than having two eyes to be cast into hell fire:" or this description of the road to heaven: "Enter ye in at the strait gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there may be which go in thereat, because strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth into life and few there be that find it;" or these strong statements of theological truth: "Except a man be borne again he cannot see the kingdom of God;" "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you;" "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins."

It was by such plain, definite, and fearless teachings as these, in which the sharpest distinctions were purposely drawn, that Christ showed the limitations of a Gospel of love, and thus aroused the anger and opposition of the Scribes and Pharisees. His call was imperative; his religion was absolute; his service commanded such a complete self-surrender of heart and soul as can be given to God alone. And there was no promise of salvation to those who rejected the call. It mattered not whether the multitude listened or turned away from his message; with all Christ's intense passion to save the lost, he paid no attention to human majorities. If it be asked here what, then, becomes of the majority? the reply is that God himself will take care of the majority. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

It is not for the Church to be more merciful than Christ, her Master, was, or to dogmatize where that Master was silent. She has already acted upon that principle in her ministrations, and has failed; and every time she renews the attempt she will repeat the failure.

This undue regard for the majority is one of the snares of the times. This continual effort to make Christ's religion liberal enough to embrace all sorts and conditions of men, and attractive enough to please the masses who reject them, is the bane of modern Christianity. The impression has gone abroad that the majority rule, and that even the religion of Jesus Christ must be changed and adapted to the ever-changing conditions of the world, lest it should lose its hold on the masses.

If ever there was an era when it is needful for the Church to take her stand against the slavery of mere social influences, to show all that her aim is not to please men but to please God, to appear in the eyes of men as a city set on a hill, and as a beacon light, illumining the surrounding darkness with steady and unobstructed radiance, it is in the ending of this nineteenth century.

How To Use Cottolene

the new shortening, like all other things must be rightly used if you wish the best results. Never, in any recipe, use more than two-thirds as much Cottolene as you used to use of lard. Never put Cottolene in a hot pan. Put it in when cold and heat it with the pan. Be careful not to burn Cottolene. To test it, add a drop of water; if hot enough, it will pop. Cottolene, when rightly used, delights everyone. Get the genuine, sold everywhere in tins, with trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

HANDWRITING ON THE WALL.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Dan. 5: 30: "In that night was Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, slain."

NIGHT was about to come down on Babylon. The shadows of her two hundred and fifty towers began to lengthen. The Euphrates rolled on, touched by the fiery splendors of the setting sun; and gates of brass, burnished and glittering, opened and shut like doors of flame. The hanging gardens of Babylon, wet with the heavy dew, began to pour, from starlit flowers and dripping leaf, a fragrance for many miles around. The streets and squares were lighted for dance and frolic and promenade. The theatres and galleries of art invited the wealth, and pomp, and grandeur of the city to rare entertainments. Scenes of riot and wassail were mingled in every street; and godless mirth, and outrageous excess and splendid wickedness came to the king's palace, to do their mightiest deeds of darkness.

A royal feast to-night at the king's palace! Rushing up to the gates are chariots, upholstered with precious cloths from Dedan, and drawn by fire-eyed horses from Togarmah, that rear and neigh in the grasp of the charioteers, while a thousand lords dismount, and women, dressed in all the splendors of Syrian emerald, and the color-blending of agate, and the chasteness of coral, and the sombre glory of Tyrian purple, and princely embroideries, brought from afar by camels across the desert, and by ships of Tarshish across the sea.

Open wide the gates and let the guests come in. The chamberlains and cupbearers are all ready. Hark to the rustle of the silks, and to the carol of the music! See the blaze of the jewels! Lift the banners. Fill the cups. Clap the cymbals. Blow the trumpets. Let the night go by with song, and dance, and ovation; and let that Babylonish tongue be palsied that will not say, "O King Belshazzar, live forever."

Ah! my friends, it was not any common banquet to which these great people came. All parts of the earth had sent their richest viands to that table. Brackets and chandeliers flashed their light upon tankards of burnished gold. Fruits, ripe and luscious, in baskets of silver, entwined with leaves, plucked from royal conservatories. Vases, inlaid with emerald and ridged with exquisite traceries, filled with nuts that were threshed from forests of distant lands. Wine brought from the royal vats, foaming in the decanters and bubbling in the chalices. Tufts of cassia and frankincense wafting their sweetness from wall and table. Gorgeous banners unfolding in the breeze that came through the open window, bewitched with the perfumes of hanging gardens. Fountains rising up from inclosures of ivory, in jets of crystal, to fall in clattering rain of diamonds and pearls. Statues of mighty men looking down from niches in the wall upon crowns and shields brought from subdued empires. Idols of wonderful work standing on pedestals of precious stones. Embroideries [illegible] with ivory and agate. Music, mingling the thrum of harps, and the clash of cymbals, and the blast of trumpets in one wave of transport that went rippling along the wall and breathing among the garlands, and pouring down the corridors, and thrilling the souls of a thousand banqueters. The signal is given, and the lords and ladies, the mighty men and women of the land, come around the table. Pour out the wine. Let foam and bubble kiss the rim! Hoist every one his cup and drink to the sentiment: "O King Belshazzar, live forever!" Bestarred head-band and carcanet of royal beauty gleam to the uplifted chalices, as again, and again, and again they are emptied. Away with care from the palace! Tear royal dignity to tatters! Pour out more wine! Give us more light, wilder music, sweeter perfume! Lord shouts to lord, captain ogles to captain. Goblets clash; decanters rattle. There come in the obscene song, and the drunken hiccough, and the slavering lip, and the guffaw of idiotic laughter, bursting from the lips of princes, flushed, reeling bloodshot; while mingling with it all I hear, "Huzza! huzza! for great Belshazzar!"

What is that on the plastering of the wall? Is it a spirit! Is it a phantom? Is it God? The music stops. The goblets fall from the nerveless grasp. There is a thrill. There is a start. There is a thousand-voiced shriek of horror. Let Daniel be brought in to read that writing. He comes in. He reads it: "Weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Meanwhile the Medes, who for two years had been laying siege to that city, took advantage of that carousal and came in. I hear the feet of the conquerors on the palace-stairs. Massacre rushes in with a thousand gleaming knives. Death bursts upon the scene; and I shut the door of that banqueting-hall, for I do not want to look. There is nothing there but torn banners, and broken wreaths, and the slush of upset tankards, and the blood of murdered women, and the kicked and tumbled carcass of a dead king. For "in that night was Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, slain."

I go on to learn some lessons from all this. I learn that when God writes anything on the wall, a man had better read it as it is. Daniel did not misinterpret or modify the handwriting on the wall. It is all foolishness to expect a minister of the Gospel to preach always things that the people like, or the people choose. Young men of Washington, what shall I preach to you to-night? Shall I tell you of the dignity of human nature? Shall I tell you of the wonders that our race has accomplished? "Oh! no," you say; "tell me the message that came from God." I will. If there is any handwriting on the wall, it is this lesson: "Repent! Accept of Christ and be saved!" I might talk of a great many other things; but that is the message, and so I declare it. Jesus never flattered those to whom he preached. He said to those who did wrong, and who were offensive in his sight, "Ye generation of vipers! ye whited sepulchres! how can ye escape the damnation of hell!" Paul the apostle preached before a man who was not ready to hear him preach. What subject did he take? Did he say, "Oh! you are a good man, a very fine man, a very noble man?" No; he preached of righteousness to a man who was unrighteous; of temperance to a man who was a victim of bad appetites; of the judgment to come to a man who was unfit for it. So we must always declare the message that happens to come to us. Daniel must read it as it is. A minister preached before James I. of England, who was James VI. of Scotland. What subject did he take? The king was noted all over the world for being unsettled and wavering in his ideas. What did the minister preach about to this man who was James I. of England and James VI. of Scotland? He took for his text James first and sixth: "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed." Hugh Latimer offended the king by a sermon he preached; and the king said, "Hugh Latimer, come and apologize." "I will," said Hugh Latimer. So the day was appointed; and the king's chapel was full of lords, and dukes, and the mighty men and women of the country, for Hugh Latimer was to apologize. He began his sermon by saying, "Hugh Latimer, bethink thee! Thou art in the presence of thine earthly king, who can destroy thy body. But bethink thee, Hugh Latimer, that thou art in the presence of the King of heaven and earth, who can destroy both body and soul in hell-fire." Then he preached with appalling directness at the king's crimes.

Another lesson that comes to us to-night: there is a great difference between the opening of the banquet of sin and its close. Young man, if you had looked in upon the banquet in the first few hours, you would have wished you had been invited there, and could sit at the feast. "Oh! the grandeur of Belshazzar's feast!" you would have said; but you look in at the close of the banquet, and your blood curdles with horror. The King of Terrors has there a ghastlier banquet; human blood is the wine, and dying groans are the music. Sin has made itself a king in the earth. It has crowned itself. It has spread a banquet. It invites all the world to come to it. It has hung in its banqueting-hall the spoils of all kingdoms, and the banners of all nations. It has gathered from all music. It has strewn, from its wealth, the tables, and floors, and arches. And yet how often is that banquet broken up; and how horrible is its end! Ever and anon there is a handwriting on the wall. A king falls. A great culprit is arrested. The knees of wickedness knock together. God's judgment, like an armed host, breaks in upon the banquet; and that night is Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, slain.

Here is a young man who says, "I cannot see why they make such a fuss about the intoxicating cup. Why, it is exhilarating! It makes me feel well. I can talk better, think better, feel better. I cannot see why people have such a prejudice against it." A few years pass on, and he wakes up and finds himself in the clutches of an evil habit which he tries to break, but cannot; and he cries out, "Oh Lord God! help me!" It seems as though God would not hear his prayer; and in an agony of body and soul he cries out, "It biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder." How bright it was at the start! How black it was at the last!

Here is a man who begins to read loose novels. "They are so charming," he says; "I will go out and see for myself whether all these things are so." He opens the gate of a sinful life. He goes in. A sinful sprite meets him with her wand. She waves her wand, and it is all enchantment. Why, it seems as if the angels of God had poured out phials of perfume in the atmosphere. As he walks on, he finds the hills becoming more radiant with foliage, and the ravines more resonant with the falling water. Oh! what a charming landscape he sees! But that sinful sprite, with her wand, meets him again; but now she reverses the wand, and all the enchantment is gone. The cup is full of poison. The fruit turns to ashes. All the leaves of the bower are forked tongues of hissing serpents. The flow[illegible] fountains fall back in a dead pool ster[illegible] ful with corruption. The luring songs [illegible] come curses and screams of demo[illegible] laughter. Lost spirits gather about [illegible] and feel for his heart, and beckon him [illegible] with "Hail brother! Hail, blasted sp[illegible] hail!" He tries to get out. He come[illegible] the front door where he entered, and [illegible] to push it back, but the door turns aga[illegible] him; and in the jar of that shutting [illegible] he hears these words, "This night is [illegible] shazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, sla[illegible]" Sin may open bright as the morning, it ends dark as the night!

I learn further from this subject [illegible] death sometimes breaks in upon a banq[illegible]t. Why did he not go down to the prison [illegible] Babylon? There were people there [illegible] would like to have died. I suppose t[illegible]re were men and women in torture in [illegible] city who would have welcomed de[illegible]th, but he comes to the palace; and ju[illegible] at the time when the mirth is dashing t[illegible]e tiptop pitch, Death breaks in at the [illegible]n-quet. We have often seen the same t[illegible]ng illustrated. Here is a young man [illegible] come from college. He is kind. [illegible] is loving. He is enthusiastic. He is [illegible]o-quent. By one spring he may bou[illegible] to heights toward which many men [illegible]ve been struggling for years. A profe[illegible]on opens before him. He is established [illegible]he law. His friends cheer him. Em[illegible]nt men encourage him. After awhile [illegible]ou may see him standing in the Am[illegible]an Senate, or moving a popular assem[illegible]age by his eloquence, as trees are move[illegible] a whirlwind. Some night he retires [illegible]ly. A fever is on him. Delirium, like a [illegible]ck-less charioteer, seizes the reins of h[illegible] intellect. Father and mother stand b[illegible]nd see the tides of his life going out t[illegible]the great ocean. The banquet is coming an end. The lights of thought, and [illegible]th, and eloquence are being extinguished. The garlands are snatched from the brow. The vision is gone. Death at the banqu[illegible]

We saw the same thing, on a [illegible]ger scale, illustrated in our Civil [illegible]ar. Our whole nation had been sittin[illegible] at a national banquet—North, South, Ea[illegible]and West. What grain was there, b[illegible] we grew it on our hills. What inventio[illegible] was there, but our rivers must turn th[illegible]ew wheel, and rattle the strange s[illegible]ttle. What warm furs, but our traders [illegible] bring them from the Arctic. Wha[illegible]ish, but our nets must sweep them f[illegible] the markets. What music, but it mu[illegible]sing in our halls. What eloquence, but [illegible]ust speak in our Senates. Ho! to the n[illegible]onal banquet, reaching from mountain to [illegible]un-tain, and from sea to sea! To prep[illegible] that banquet, the sheep-folds and the [illegible] of the country sent their best tre[illegible]res. The orchards piled up on the tab[illegible] their sweet fruits. The presses burst o[illegible] wit[illegible] new wines. To sit at that table, c[illegible]e the yeomanry of New Hampshire, a[illegible] the lumbermen of Maine, and the Ca[illegible]ina from the rice plantation, and the Ve[illegible] emigrant from the pines of Oreg[illegible] we were all brothers—brothers at ban[illegible]quet. Suddenly the feast ended. Wh[illegible] meant those mounds thrown up at [illegible] amauga, Shiloh, Atlanta, Gettysburg, South Mountain? What meant the [illegible] en grain-fields, turned into a pa[illegible]rade ground for cavalry horses? Wha[illegible]ean the corn-fields gulled with the w[illegible] the heavy supply-train? Why tho[illegible]rivers of tears—those lakes of blood? [illegible] angry! Justice must come. A hand ritin[illegible] on the wall! The nation had been [illegible] and found wanting. Darkness! Dark[illegible]ness! Woe to the North! Woe [illegible] South! Woe to the East! Woe [illegible] West! Death at the banquet.

I have also to learn from the [illegible] that the destruction of the vicious [illegible] those who despise God, will be very su[illegible]den. The wave of mirth had [illegible]ched i[illegible] the highest point when the invadi[illegible] army broke through. It was unexpecte[illegible] suddenly, almost always, comes the hom[illegible] to those who despise God, and defy [illegible] of men. How was it at the Delu[illegible]?

y suppose it came through a long north-st storm, so that people for days before re sure it was coming? No; I suppose morning was bright; that calmness oded on the waters; that beauty sat ehroned on the hills; when suddenly the hvens burst, and the mountains sank ke anchors into the sea that dashed clear o the Andes and the Himalayas.
he Red Sea was divided. The Egypns tried to cross it. There could be no d ger. The Israelites had just gone though; where they had gone, why not t Egyptians? Oh! it was such a beau-il walking-place! A pavement of tinged s lls and pearls, and on either side two gat walls of water—solid. There can bo danger. Forward, great host of the Egptians! Clap the cymbals, and blow t trumpets of victory! After them! We vl catch them yet, and they shall be desyed. But the walls begin to tremble!
Ley rock! They fall! The rushing wats! The shriek of drowning men! The swimming of the war-horses in vain for t shore! The strewing of the great host o the bottom of the sea, or pitched by the ary wave on the beach—a battered, bised, and loathsome wreck! Suddenly dtruction came. One half-hour before ty could not have believed it. Destroyed;
al without remedy.
: am just setting forth a fact, which you lve noticed as well as I. Ananias comes the apostle. The apostle says: "Did u sell the land for so much?" He says, "es." It was a lie. Dead! as quick as t! Sapphira, his wife, comes in. "Did u sell the land for so much?" "Yes."
Iwas a lie; and quick as that she was d! God's judgments are upon those o despise him and defy him. They come sidenly.
The destroying angel went through Lypt. Do you suppose that any of the ple knew that he was coming? Did ty hear the flap of his great wing? No! ll! Suddenly, unexpectedly, he came.
Skilled sportsmen do not like to shoot a d standing on a sprig near by. If they a skilled, they pride themselves on taki it on the wing: and they wait till it rts. Death is an old sportsman; and loves to take men flying under the very
sn. He loves to take them on the wing.
O! flee to God this night! If there be e in this presence who has wandered far ay from Christ, though he may not have ard the call of the Gospel for many a ar, I invite him now to come and be ved. Flee from thy sin! Flee to the tronghold of the Gospel! Now is the ac-pted time: now is the day of salvation.
Good-night, my young friends! may you ve rosy sleep, guarded by him who nev-slumbers! May you awake in the morng strong and well! But oh! art thou a spiser of God? Is this thy last night on rth? Should'st thou be awakened in e night by something, thou knowest not hat, and there be shadows floating in the om, and a handwriting on the wall, and u feel that your last hour is come, and ere he a fainting at the heart, and a treor in the limb, and a catching of the eath—then thy doom would be but an no of the words of the text: "In that ght was Belshazzar, the king of the haldeans, slain."
Oh! that my Lord Jesus would now ake himself so attractive to your souls at you cannot resist him; and if you ve never prayed before, or have not ayed since those days when you knelt wn at your mother's knee, then that toght you might pray, saying:

[illegible] I was [illegible] for me.
And [illegible] bid'st me come to thee,
O Lord, I come.

But if you cannot think of so long a ayer as that, I will give you a shorter ayer that you can say: "God be mercil to me, a sinner!" Or, if you cannot ink of so long a prayer as that, I will ve you a still shorter one that you may ter, "Lord, save me, or I perish!" Or, that be too long a prayer, you need not ake it. Use the word "Help!" Or, if at be too long a word, you need not use y word at all. Just look and live!

Missionary Work in Persia.

A Native Christian Medical Missionary Writes of its Progress in Recent Years.

FOR the last sixty years missionary work has been carried on among the Nestorians of Persia. This is a small nation, one hundred thousand of them living in Turkey and forty thousand in Persia. We can confidently say that they were among the first heathen nations to accept Christ as far back as the first century. They were the purest Protestant church of the ancient times. In those old days they had schools of theology in many places and were a missionary church. They sent missionaries to far China and India. Ever since, they have been the victims of persecution and martyrdom under the Fire-worshipers, as well as under the Mohammedans. The bloody Tamerlane, in the fourteenth century, rushed down upon them with his cruel hordes, and nearly annihilated them. In 1848, two Koordish chiefs, Nur-Ollah-Beg, and Beder-Khan-Beg, came sweeping like a hurricane. They killed by thousands, men, women and children, simply because they would not give up their faith in Christ. Through such trials the Nestorians maintained their primitive faith in the greatest purity. They clung to their Bibles with a most desperate tenacity, and reverenced them as the Word of God. But, after their schools were all demolished, their churches spoiled, and their books burned, they at last became very ignorant and superstitious, leaving the care of their souls, for the most part, to the priests.

In such a time of great need Dr. Perkins, in 1835, began his labors among them. The difficulties confronting the inauguration of the work would have seemed insurmountable to anyone not possessed of Dr. Perkins' indomitable energy and grit. He started a school in 1836 in a cellar, with seven students, and no books to study with. This school has grown to be a big college, in Oroomiah. In 1838 a printing press was bought. The Bible was translated from the Ancient into the Modern Syriac. When those Nestorians read the word of God in the language which they understood, they said, "it is time to give glory to God, since printing is begun among us." This branch of the work has proved to be a great success, hundreds of spiritual pamphlets, tracts and volumes having been translated into Syriac.

We are indebted to Dr. Benjamin Labaree, who for many years has done all he could to give us the best literature, and it was through his successful labor that we have to-day the purest and best revision of the Bible.

Dr. Shedd has been a great teacher and preacher; he had a meek and gentle spirit; of him we can say truly, "he loved us and was not ashamed to call us his brethren;" he gave himself for us, and has gone to his reward. The names of Perkins, Stoddard, Coan, Cochran, Rhea, Labaree and Shedd will be everlastingly remembered by the Nestorians.

But there are other brilliant stars in the sky of Persian missions. We cannot forget Miss Fiske Rice and Jennie Dean and A. Montgomery, who have done so much for the down-trodden women of Persia. Their difficulties were great and their discouragements numerous. We can easily understand this by giving a moment's consideration to the condition of women in those Mohammedan lands, where they worked and are working.

The condition of Persian women presents an appalling contrast in physical bondage to the enlightened freedom of the women of America. Well may many Persians say, "Oh? what a glorious freedom is your's, American women!" The Persian women, wives and daughters and sisters of Mohammedans are abused, degraded and reviled by church and state alike. Their social status is a most undesirable one. Wives of a polygamous race of men, they are slaves of a husband's passion, caprice and religion. They never sit at table with him, and must ask arbitrary permission to do the slightest thing. They are never permitted to walk abroad without being enveloped in the cumbersome robes prescribed for them, and as for education, recreation and employment, they are positively forbidden.

The picture of a Persian harem is not the glowing elysium that people are commonly led to believe the original to be, but rather one of mutual distrust and abject servile obedience in conformity with the usual Mohammedan rites.

How those women have longed for the introduction of the Christian religion into Persia! They believe that with religious enlightenment the barbarous nature of the Mohammedans will become softened, and themselves freed of a spiritual and social yoke that is galling to their very souls. We can readily understand why these women are so anxious for the true religion. It means freedom to them. It means personal liberty and advancement.

Over in Persia the women, sincerely desiring truth and freedom, steal to the Mission tent or into the cave of some religieuse who gives them sufficient strength to bear the torments to which they return, often, indeed to face punishments as barbarous and horrible as the Christian martyrs of the past were ever called upon to endure. The Persian women are willing to do anything, to suffer anything, to promulgate and promote the Christian religion in their country. These are some of the messages they send by their Mission students to the American women whom they regard much in the light of angels. And it seems that the cry of the women of my country for emancipation by the Gospel is one of the most potent compliments that can be paid to your American civilization, since they recognize that through the Gospel alone can they attain the same attitude of independent thought and action now enjoyed by American women.

Among our women did Miss Fidelia Fiske faithfully work, establishing a school called Fiske Seminary. There could not be found one woman who could read at all when she began, and she was heard many times praying, "O! Lord help me to love these women, and teach me to do what is needed for them.' She was followed by Miss Rice and Miss Dean, who have done more than we can ever describe to elevate and enlighten our womankind. Miss Anna Montgomery, in Hamadan, has the spirit of Miss Fiske, and has done much for American and Jewish girls. Years will roll by before we can ever forget those names. They will have their reward from God. Out of those ages of darkness and ignorance they have given us an army of well-trained women, some of them knowing half a dozen languages, and among them we have some excellent Bible women and teachers who are doing much to help the cause of Christ in raising up their degraded sisters.

Medical work is more desired than anything else in Persia to carry the Gospel to the hearts of the people. There are as many as ten millions of inhabitants in the country who are almost without a physician. The natives have some ways of giving medicine to the sick which are absolutely absurd. Sometimes the priest will write a few words from the Koran on a slip of paper, and will wash the paper in water and let the patient drink. Hospitals and institutions of any sort are unheard of in Persia. Thousands of poor and sick are turned into the streets, without care for them at all. We have two Mission hospitals in Oroomiah, that are doing an unspeakable amount of good. They are crowded with patients of all sorts, from many parts of Oroomiah and surrounding districts, even from the Kurdistan Mountains. The wild Koords come there and receive kind attention and treatment, and hear the Word of God, and many become converted to Christianity. The Mohammedan women come there with their troubles. They find those hospitals next to heaven when they compare them with their homes, where they had no attention whatever, and they realize that the religion of Christ is better than that of Mohammed, who cares nothing for women. No branch of missionary work represents such a systematic amount of good and mercy as medicine. Think of thousands of poverty-stricken men, women and children who have been taken care of—healed, fed and dressed. Therefore they love the physicians and allow them into their harems, and permit them to speak of Christ if they so desire. It is high time to help poor Persia by a good number of well-trained physicians, with proper equipment to do the work of the Master who always had compassion on the sick, who said to his disciples, "Into whatsoever city ye enter, heal the sick that are therein and say unto them the Kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." The Page's Dilemma.

THE Rev. Mr. Ashe, who was one of the trusted colleagues of the late Bishop Hannington in his African labors, relates the following incident: The first time I was presented at court to his majesty of Uganda, I offered to teach any of the young men about the place to read. My offer was accepted by a lad, one of the king's pages who came to my house every day for his lesson. Soon he showed by his life that he was a sincere and intelligent Christian, and was drawing nearer and nearer to Christ, when one day, of his own free will, he asked to be baptized, and he was received into the Church under the name of Samuel.

This same convert had been promoted to a place of trust by the king, and by him was despatched to a vassal chief to collect the tribute, consisting of so many thousands of court shells, and it was while he was on this errand that the great and fatal persecution of Christians broke out. Immediately on returning to the city, Samuel heard that his name was down on the martyrs' list, and at once he came to me for advice. "What have I to do?" he asked; "I have in my possession this tribute of the king; how have I to dispose of it?" "You must not go back to the king," I answered; "he has the heart of a wild beast rather than that of a man: it is certain death for you to go uear him."

Then Samuel took a piece of paper, and began to write, but I could see he was not satisfied. Looking up, he said, "If I were to throw away the King's tribute and run, he would think I had stolen it." "Then," I said, "could you not take it early in the morning, and deliver it to the chief, whose duty it is to receive it, and then make your escape?" This he determined to do, though going there meant that he might be seized and dragged off to death. He took the tribute, and delivered it, and quietly mixing with the crowd, walked away. When he visited me a night or two afterward, I asked him, "Did you not run as soon as you could?" "No," he replied, "I walked deliberately away, feeling sure God would keep me."

THE WOES OF INTEMPERANCE.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 24. Isa. 5: 11-23. Golden Text: Isa. 5: 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHEN the almighty God pronounces "Woe," then it is woe indeed, even as when he says, "Blessed," he has the power to bless. After the lamentation of the prophet Isaiah in his first chapter, he speaks immediately of "the latter days" of the coming glory of Israel (chap. 2: 2-4; 4: 2-6), but also of the judgment in the latter days, the time of the great tribulation, (ver. 10: 22), and he intersperses his prophecy with a further description of the apostasy of Israel joined to the exhortation, "Oh house of Jacob, come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." God's cause was life to this man of God; he lived for nothing else, and the burden of his God lay upon him as he saw Jerusalem ruined and Judah fallen, because their tongue and their doings were "against the Lord, to provoke the eyes of his glory." Looking with a prophet's eye on the present and on the future, he says: "Say ye of the righteous that it shall be well with him: for they shall eat the fruit of their doings.

Woe unto the Wicked

for it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hands shall be given him." (chap. 3: 8, 10, 11). The concentration of what God includes when he says, Woe shall come upon the earth in the coming time of trouble when the man of sin shall reign over all the inhabitants of the earth and force them to worship him on pain of death. (Rev. 13: 11-18). Then will be accomplished the woe, woe, woe of Rev. 8: 13, as we see in the terrible prophecies which follow. But the same God who will then execute his vengeance on "them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ," (II. Thess. 1: 7, 8), pronounces, even in Isaiah's time, woe unto the wicked. Our chapter begins with a parable illustrating all which God has done for his people and how he has received no return, his vineyard has brought forth only wild grapes; Israel did not know, his people did not consider their high calling to be his witnesses among the nations, and therefore God pronounces judgment upon his people.

What is it that has brought about the destruction of Israel? Six sins are mentioned which all have their root in selfishness; "we have turned everyone to his own way" (Isa. 53: 6), and one of them, drunkenness, is twice named. The first mentioned is covetousness: "Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no rooms and ye be made to dwell alone in the midst of the land" (Isa. 5: 8). The sin of covetousness is as strong amongst God's ancient people now as it was in Isaiah's days. But it is not peculiar to the Jews. O, how many so-called Christians join house to house, factory to factory, store to store, utterly regardless of how it may affect their struggling neighbors. The principle of "Live and let live" has died out, and the combinations of the rich capitalists to tread others down out of the market, and to get a monopoly, ruins thousands of those who do business in a small way. "Might is right," is the principle on which they go, but this is not to be found in the Word of the living God.

"Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink: that tarry late into the night till wine inflame them: and the harp and the lute and the tabret and the pipe are in their feasts: but they regard not the work of the Lord, neither have they considered the operation of his hands" (R.V.). The question was asked of a holy man of God many years ago, when there was hardly any total abstainers to be found: "Why do you not drink wine?" "Because I find it unfits me for prayer," was the answer. The holy soul of this saint of God shrank from anything which could, in the least degree, change the atmosphere with his communion with God. It is not only excessive drinking which makes men regardless of the work of the Lord; even of stimulants has been found by many to unfit them for real and deep communion with God. But, O, how solemn is God's woe. Here are men intended by God to be an image of himself, and to hold the place of dignity and honor in his creation; and for the gratification of a few moments' excitement, they are willing to hand themselves over to a foreign power which they know will unman, degrade, and destroy them! But the same lust of the flesh, which makes the covetous man the despicable being that he is, makes the miserable slave of drink to be equally the dupe and slave of Satan, the laughing-stock of the thoughtless, the pity of the compassionate. Woe unto them who think they can play with edge tools, and drink with impunity. Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink. How many are there who boast in their strength of nerve and of will, and declare that they can stop when they will, and they do not see that the coils of the mighty python are insidiously winding themselves around them, and that they are already slaves. It is a dangerous thing for himself when a young man tampers with strong drink, and it may lead to the death of others, who may follow his example, even if he should escape.

The question for the Christian is not: "Will the taking of stimulants harm me?" a higher motive belongs to one who, as a new creature in Christ Jesus lives no more unto himself, but unto him which died for him and rose again" (II. Cor. 5: 15): the question with him is, "Can I serve and honor my God, and can I serve my fellow creatures most by taking stimulants or by abstaining from them?" There is but one answer. God here draws a terrible picture of the consequences of strong drink: "My people are gone into captivity." Take it in the lowest sense and search the prisons in our own land: how many are there through drink? Some tell us nine in every ten. "Their honorable men are famished, and their multitude parched with thirst." High born men and highly educated are among the victims who suffer from literal hunger and famine through the consequence of drink. And the multitude! how much we see of distress, of lack of work, of sour and angry expression on their faces, parched with thirst; the drink causes a very great deal of this. "Therefore hell (lit. hades the place of the departed) hath enlarged herself and opened her mouth without measure; and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and he that rejoiceth among them shall descend into it." It is the place of the dead must be enlarged because so many die of drunkenness, and after death the judgment (Heb. 9: 27)! How will the multitude of suicides by drink excuse their awful sin of destoying the spirit, soul and body of God's creation, for the sake of a passing gratification? Oh! how true the picture is. The mean man is bowed down, the drink makes him meaner still, and the great man (in his own eyes) is humbled! Humbled but not humble! In humble circumstances without a humble hearf! Until God lays hold of a drunkard, all misery does not bring him down; he will excuse himself to the very last, deny his sin or justify himself. The poor creature is not himself; he has given himself over to a power mightier than his own, and he is reaping the awful consequences. The only real hope for the drunkard is the Friend of Sinners; the precious blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin, was shed for the drunkard too; for the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost. (Luke, 19: 10.)

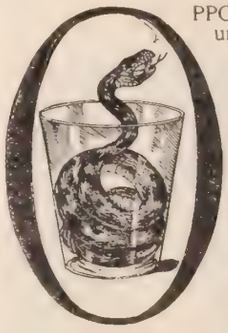
God promises also his woe to the wicked scoffer, who dares to say to God when he is long-suffering, and does not immediately execute vengeance: "Let him make speed, let him hasten his work that we may see it; and let the counsel of the Holy One of Israel draw nigh that we know it. Woe to them that call evil good and good evil. Woe to the self-righteous, who are wise in their own eyes and prudent in their own sight? Woe to them who pervert justice, which justify the wicked for reward."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.



OPPORTUNITIES of urging the duty of total abstinence should never be neglected by any one sincerely concerned for the welfare of young people. In spite of the efforts of temperance societies, drunkenness is increasing in our land. Government statistics show that the consumption of liquor not only increases from one decade to another, but increases more rapidly than the population. If with a population of sixty millions we consumed double the quantity that sufficed when it was thirty millions, we should know that temperance, though making no progress, was maintaining its ground, but it is not so. The nation of sixty millions uses far more than double the quantity that was used when it was thirty millions. The inference is unavoidable that we have either more people who drink now, or that those who drink, drink more than their fathers did. Either alternative is ominous. There is evidently need for more earnest work on behalf of temperance, and it will be more effective if directed to prevention rather than to cure. It is weary, disappointing work to reclaim the drunkard. All honor to those who are engaged in it. All our sympathy and help are due to the man who is trying to emancipate himself from the bondage of the degrading habit. But the work that has hope in it, the work that will tell, is that of setting young feet in the path of safety and strengthening the fortress before it has been captured. This work the teacher may do. He will not have much difficulty in convincing the child of the woes of the drunkard. No child is so obtuse as to need proof of the fact. He sees it for himself. What he does not see is his own danger of experiencing those woes. Of this he needs to be convinced and to be induced to take measures to insure his safety.

Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes. A great orator tells this fable: A serpent lay in the centre of a circle of fire, asking all who passed to lift him out. One man going by—the kind of man who is sure he has enough self control to drink without becoming a drunkard—stopped and looked at the snake. "If I do," said the man, "you may bite me." "Oh, no, I won't." "I am afraid to trust you." "Help me out of the fire, or it will consume me. I promise on my word of honor I won't bite you." The man takes up the snake and lifts it out of the fiery circle and lays it on the ground. Instantly it says, "Now I'll bite you." "But you promised you wouldn't." "Yes, but it's my nature to bite, and I can't help it." So it is with the drink, it is its nature to bite.

My people are gone into captivity. There is a fascination in drinking that is not cured by suffering. Once the appetite is started the man returns to it like a slave in bonds. John B. Gough used to tell a story of a stalwart countryman who seldom went to a city, and looked very simple though he was a strong, manly fellow. He went into a drug store in Boston and told the clerk that his sister had sent him for some pe fume, and he wanted to smell around little. The countryman tested several pe fumes, and liked each better than the o before it, until the clerk, getting tired of l indecision, produced a bottle of strong a monia. "Now," he said, "this is a ve subtle essence, and if you want to get t full virtue of it—the pure scent—you mu draw in as hard as you can; a simple sn will not do any good." The countrym was all curiosity. "Hold on a minute he said, "and when I say 'now' let have it." Then he shouted "now," a over he went. What did he do? Get and smell again? No, he had too mu common sense. As soon as he got on feet he squared his arms and began to sh fight. He threatened the clerk with worst kind of punishment if he play another such a trick on him. There some sense in that; but in the matter drinking, men go up to their old enemy he knocks them over. Up they get over they go again, and so it continues they have scarcely strength to crawl.

The mighty man shall be humbled. clergyman who recently visited New Y from a Western city told this story: had a college friend who was almost idol to me. Whatever he attempted succeeded in doing better than anyone e He was a magnificent athlete. It wa pleasure to see him leap and swim and In the class-room he was ahead of us It took him very little effort to prepare his recitations. He was a genius. married well. His wife was not beautiful and good, she was wealthy. separated after graduation day, I to charge of a church, he to read law heard from him occasionally, and in on his letters he wrote that he had been e ed to Congress. He went, and the H was thrilled with his eloquence. I come East to visit him; he is in jai larceny. It had come to that, thro drunkenness. He drank his own fort then his wife's, then all he could bor then he stole. I think there is no ch of his escaping conviction. It is the g est fall I ever knew. The man was m tally and physically grand; but the d has bronght him down and made hi utter wreck."

Woe unto them that call evil good. A temperance worker was sent for by a ly prominent in society. He wondered at could be required of him in that wea y, refined family. The lady's first que on to him when he called was if he had er known a grown-up son strike his mo r. The temperance man said he never d, except when he was intoxicated; the e had known it to be done. The lady t ed up her sleeve and showed a large brui on her beautiful arm. "My son did that, he said; "do see him and try if you can ve him." He went immediately to the 's haunts and found him just getting er after his debauch. He argued with he young man, and finding he made no impression, he urged as a strong appeal, v ch often succeeds when nothing else will at he was breaking his mother's heart. "My mother!" exclaimed the young man bitterly; "she is the cause of it all. She ed to say, 'just one glass; it will do you g d.' I hated it, but I took it to please her nd now I must drink. If I knew that I sh ld have to die for it, I should drink."

Till wine inflames them. No habit g ws so unconsciously as wine drinking. St. Augustine relates of his saintly m er, the beautiful Monica that she had to im of a great danger from which she w delivered in her youth. Her father, tr ing in her sweet innocent character, uld send her to his wine cellar for win not daring to trust his servants with the ys. Monica, curious to know the effec of the liquor that so pleased her fa r's guests, tasted it. She drank but ew drops yet she felt the thrill of em through her body. She got into the bit of drinking a little every time she as sent to draw the wine and drank m e of it as she became accustomed to it and ew to like it. She soon was in the ha t of drinking bumpers. Monica told he son that she believed she would have b me a drunkard, so insidiously had the abit grown upon her, but for a merciful t ugh humiliating experience. She had o ten one day to reprove one of the servan and the girl was insolent. She turned on Monica and exclaimed, "You! you are a d nk-ard." That word was enough. Monica never touched wine again and be ught her son never to drink.

How the Florence Mission for the Rescue of Vicious Girls was Established and What It Is Doing in Twenty Cities.

ITTLE FLORENCE CRITTENTON.

THOUSANDS of dollars are often spent on the granite or marble memorials reared over the remains of some loved one, whom death has snatched aiv; but probably the costliest memorial in ll this broad land is the one of which a pure appears on the first page of this jcrnal. The Florence Mission is the memrial Mr. Charles N. Crittenton chose fc his dear, dead daughter. It stands in Becker street, New York, a few yards wst of the Bowery, and like a lighthouse ola coast where there have been many wcks, it sheds a light of welcome for the caway who has made wreck of the voyal of life. It was a beautiful way of perpating the memory of the child whose dth almost broke her father's heart, to aciate her name with an effort to rescue gs whose condition was worse than dth. It is like that memorial which Crist appointed for the woman who anoted him with the precious ointment, the inction that wherever in all the world h Gospel should be preached, her loving sice should be told "as a memorial of h." So it has been, and the memorial is tter known and more enduring than any rble that was ever quarried, for it lives i the hearts of rn. So it is with t memorial of litt Florence. Wome now in happy hes who were ce bound with t chains of vice, lss her name; al parents whose ughters were id and are alive ain, were lost d are found, ink God for the ssion that enrines her memr. The Mission conducted on a n of Mr. Crittton's own desing. No recomendation, no forality is required admission. Any erring girl New York who is in any nd of trouble, finds the door the Florence Mission wide en, and she may go in at any ur of the day or night, and d here advice and help m fhe kind sympathetic lady hom she soon comes to call Mother" Prindle, as hundeds of girls do, to whom her ving ways have endeared her. "Mother" Prindle receives all mers tenderly. Sometimes they e dirty, drunken, diseased, but ey are sister-women, and she as unbounded faith in the powof the Holy Spirit to cleanse d sanctify the vilest. She akes her caller feel that she is elcome and assures her that if e wishes to abandon her sinful fe and to try to retrieve the past, no pains ill be spared to help her. She may make e Mission her home; if she needs clothg, it is given her, and all manner of indness is lavished upon her. If she ishes to return to her evil ways, the oor is still open, she has not been deoyed into prison; but she is warned that he way she is taking is the way of death, nd is assured that the prayers of her riends will follow her until she is finally edeemed. If she will stay, or if going ut she will return, she is lovingly led to Christ and told how he yearns over the outcast, how he has power to save and keep, and is urged to put her trust in him. If she yields, practical help is given her. If she can be restored to her family, the way is prepared for her; or if she has no friends to receive her, she is helped to earn her own living.

"Are you not often imposed upon?" Mrs. Prindle was asked. "Oh, yes, she said, "girls will come who have no desire to reform, but merely want a home for a time, while they get over some trouble or sickness, and they pretend to be repentant. But we never get discouraged. Some who thus mean to take advantage of us have been wonderfully saved. The Holy Spirit touches their hearts in spite of themselves. Even those who go away, know that we are their friends and that we are disinterested, and their consciences tell them that what we say to them is right and true. They think of it after they have left, and the old life is never the same to them again. Eventually, they generally come back." Nothing is more significant about the work than the firm conviction Mrs. Prindle, like Mr. Crittenton has, that the power of the Holy Spirit is the one and only ground of dependence for success in all the efforts put forth. When she was asked if the reformation of life was generally permanent, Mrs. Prindle answered that it must be, for the Holy Spirit kept all who trusted his power. "They sometimes fall back into sin, but not as before: it is only for a time, and they are restored. Of all who have stayed at the Mission fully sixty per cent. have been saved, some have died rejoicing in Christ; others are with their families; others are serving Christ in carrying on rescue work, and all are leading decent lives. Yes, it pays; it has paid me for nearly twenty years of the hardest kind of labor." It is gratifying to know, that one who has such excellent opportunities for forming an opinion as Mrs. Prindle, is hearty in her commendation of the much-abused work of Dr. Parkhurst. She mentions several instances of girls, who have come under her care through the raids of the society, who but for them, would, in all probability, be still leading lives of sin. One in particular, the inmate of a song and dance house, who has been saved, said that she was never sober enough to think of her condition until the house was raided and she had to seek a new home. She declared that she would never have had the courage and decision to quit if she had not been forced out of the vile den where she had been for years.

The New York Mission has been engaged in its beneficent work for more than twelve years. Its origin lay in an inquiry addressed to Mr. Crittenton one night in an expedition in the slums of the city. In the days when, in his bitter sorrow over the death of his beloved child, God was dealing with his soul, Mr. Crittenton looked around for some work to do for Christ. He was wealthy, and his business was increasing yearly and furnishing him with a larger income continually, and he might have found occupation in developing it. But he wanted to carry to darkened souls the light that had illumined his own. His friend, Mr. Smith N. Allen, invited him to go with him to see a humble work that he and Mr. H. B. Gibbud were doing in one of the vilest streets in lower New York. He went, and found in helping others some relief for his own trouble. One night he spoke to an abandoned woman in the neighborhood of the house where the little service was held, and urged her to forsake her sin. The desolate creature turned on him with the question, "Where can I go? Who would give shelter to such as I?" Mr. Crittenton had some difficulty in answering her. That in a Christian city there ought to be some place where the repentant sinner can be helped to reform, he was convinced. He had the means, and he determined to establish such a place, and make it a memorial to Florence. He opened a home at 29 Bleecker street, and its usefulness was soon demonstrated. Larger quarters were needed, and he bought a house of ill-fame at 21 Bleecker street for the purpose of his mission. That home too, proved too small, and No. 23 was then bought and made into one large home, capable of accommodating thirty inmates, beside affording room for nightly services, and offices for the matron and her staff.

The value of the Mission was so abundantly proved, that Mr. Crittenton was anxious to have the work extend to other cities where it was needed as badly as in New York. An illness, the result of protracted effort, led to the fulfilment of his wish. He was compelled to leave home and seek change of scene in foreign travel. After a few months' absence he landed in his native country again on its Western shores. There an opportunity occurred to tell of the good work accomplished in New York. Christian people were eager to see a similar work there. A liberal donation from Mr. Crittenton encouraged them and a Florence Mission was established. The work went on until to-day there are twenty institutions bearing little Florence's name and doing the blessed work of reclamation now associated with it. They are in San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Jose, Oakland and Sacramento, Cal., Denver, Colo., Chicago, Ill., Fargo, S. D., Portland, Ore., Norfolk and Wheeling, Va., Atlanta, Ga., Scranton and Pittsburg, Pa., New Brunswick, N. J. and Gloversville, N. Y. Two homes have also been opened in Philadelphia and a second in New York city.

THREE OF THE FAMOUS FLORENCE MISSIONS.

Beside this, Mr. Crittenton, at the suggestion of Mr. A. W. Dennett, and with his assistance, has established a home which is entirely of a preventive character. It is designed to assist girls who come to New York to look for work and frequently fall a prey to temptation through being unable to pay the cost of boarding. By offering board and lodging at extremely low rates, and having the house under Christian influence, many are enabled to maintain themselves honorably, who, but for such help, might sink into the class that the Florence Mission is seeking to reclaim.

As an aid to usefulness, both in direct Gospel work and in visiting places where the need of such an institution as the Florence Mission is marked, Mr. Crittenton has purchased a Gospel Car which can be attached to trains on any railroad. Mr. E. F. Goff, who has had a large experience in this method of evangelizing, has arranged to accompany Mr. Crittenton on these expeditions, and assist in the services that will be held in the car. It is Mr. Crittenton's hope that he will yet see a chain of Florence Missions extending across the continent, all doing the Christlike work of saving the lost and co-operating in efforts to promote national purity and righteonsness. To this object he is giving all his time and labor.

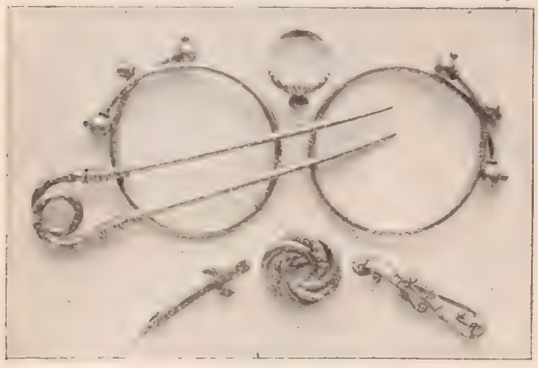
MR. CHARLES N. CRITTENTON.

ARMENIA'S REIGN OF TERROR.

Christian Blood Still Flowing and the Turkish Butchers Finding Many Fresh Victims for Slaughter—The Massacre at Trebizond.

IF it were possible to conceive of a depth of savage depravity beyond any that has yet been reached by the present Turkish government in its treatment of the Armenian Christians, the events of last week would seem to show that it had been very nearly attained. So determined is it in its policy of extermination that not only are its troops massacring the defenceless Americans at every point where they can be rounded up like a herd of cattle, for slaughter, but it is apparently resolved to prevent, if that were possible, the merciful offices of the missionaries being extended to the survivors. It is only through the united influence of the civilized governments of Europe and America that the Sultan's minions have been prevented, or dissuaded, from turning the Christian missionaries out of Armenia on short notice. This proposition, which was first disclosed in a Constantinople dispatch to the Morning Post of London, was to the effect that the American missionaries who had been dispensing relief in the Sassoun district, should withdraw within three days; otherwise, (so ran the Turkish threat), the Bitlis affair was likely to be re-enacted. More plainly stated, it was a mandate by the representatives of the Sultan that the missionaries, who had been fulfilling the Christian offices of feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, should retire and leave the wretched Armenians to find in starvation and exposure, the fate they had escaped when their homes were burned, their property stolen and their nearest and dearest relatives butchered by the cruel Kurds or the Turkish soldiery. Upon this threat to expel the missionaries being made, Mr. Terrell, the American Minister and Mr. Herbert, the British charge d' affairs, immediately made demands upon the Porte for the protection of the missionaries. Mr. Terrell added emphatically that the United States would hold Turkey responsible for the lives of the missionaries. Thereupon the Sultan's government, which, as a leading English statesman has tersely declared, "gives heed to nothing but an ultimatum," very promptly changed its attitude upon the subject and decided to send troops to protect the missionaries. It was known that the Kurds were only waiting the retirement of the missionaries from Sassoun, to re-commence their orgies of plunder, violation and slaughter, and that the only check or a repetition of the horrors of last year was the presence of those godly men and women. So threatening was the situation that the Armenian Patriarch in Constantinople, distrustful of all Turkish promises, appealed to the foreign ambassadors to prevent a massacre.

This opposition by Turkey to the presence of the missionaries, is the strongest testimony to the value and urgent need of their humanitarian work. Turkey would exterminate the Armenians by the sword, by fire, by hunger and by cold. To those of them who would not deny Christ and embrace Islam, they would do as one of the famous Moslem Caliphs did when he drove a band of Christian martyrs into the sea, because they had rejected his offer of the Mohammedan faith, coupled with promises of favors that would assure future prosperity. The sons and daughters of Armenia to-day are faithful unto death, as were their forefathers. To the glory of Armenia and the confusion of unbelief be it declared that the highest place of honor in the roll of Christian nations during nearly a century, belongs to a poor, down-trodden, long-persecuted people, whose faith has become clearer and stronger in proportion as their sufferings have multiplied. Civilization is disgraced by the fact that the cause of all these persecutions—the infidel Turk—has not long ago been rendered powerless, and his yoke removed from the neck of the oldest of Christian nations.



JEWELS CONTRIBUTED TO THE ARMENIAN RELIEF FUND

Since Turkey's set-back in her purpose of starving the exiled and homeless Armenians, the relief work has steadily continued with unabated zeal. Mr. Howard, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner (who is probably now in Van, co-operating with the missionaries), when in Armenia several months ago, had ample opportunity at that time to observe the attempts of the Turkish officials to prevent relief being afforded to the destitute Armenians. He is a man of courage and resources, and will probably be able to perform, without serious molestation, his duties as a relieving agent. He will rely upon the protection afforded by his government while he remains in Armenia, in the fulfilment of a peaceful mission of Christian charity. Yet, although his work is altogether apart from politics, it is possible that the Turkish authorities may find excuse for interference, just as they did in the case of the missionaries at Sassoun. In any event, Mr. Howard's plans are such that, even were he restrained of his personal liberty, the relief work would not be embarrassed, but would go on uninterruptedly in the hands of a competent missionary committee. Thus every dollar sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the Armenian Relief Fund will be certain of reaching its proper destination, and accomplishing the purpose for which it was contributed.

Meanwhile, the Sultan finds himself face to face with a a new danger. Turkey is apparently on the verge of anarchy, and a day may bring the news of such events as may culminate in the overthrow of the present regime. Alleged plots by Mussulmen against the life of the monarch are numerous, and many arrests have been made, and some of the accused have been summarily executed. The unhappy Sultan, tormented it may be by the memory of his cruelties and continually dreading the assassin is a prisoner in his palace.

Most significant of the approaching disintegration of the Turkish Empire is a dispatch from London, which says that, owing to news recording constantly recurring "disturbances to the detriment of Christians of all nationalities, in various parts of the Turkish Empire, Ambassadors of the great Powers went separately to the Porte to urge the immediate adoption of adequate measures to bring about the restoration of order, and to declare that if such measures were not adopted the Powers would decide in concert upon the steps to be taken." The Ambassadors requested Said Pasha, the Foreign Minister, to announce what the government intended to do to terminate the state of anarchy at present prevailing.

Some of the gifts forwarded to the Relief Fund are very touching. Laces, valuables of various kinds and many articles of jewelry have been received. One lady in the west sent a pretty set of jewelry, consisting of bracelets, gemmed hairpin, brooch and two smaller pins, and garnet-and-pearl ring, desiring that the same be sold and the proceeds credited to the Relief Fund, but as we cannot undertake to dispose of such articles, however excellent the intention of the sender, we have returned them.

All contributions to the Relief Fund should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, and all will be duly acknowledged in these columns.

The following sums have been received for the Armenian Fund during the week:

A LIFE'S HARVEST.

"DO you turn me out of the house, Uncle Aaron? Can't I live here any longer? Where shall I go?"

The speaker was a pale-faced but sturdy-looking lad of thirteen, wn arms too long for the sleeves of his ck jacket, and neither shoes nor stock-gs on his feet, though the fall day was ngly cold.

"I don't care where you go, to destruc-n if you like, so's you don't bother me re more with your high-falutin, aristo-atic, good-for-nothing-under-the-canopy s. Clear out of my sight, and out o' e house, and never dare to show your-e here again, you, with your 'can't t wood on Sunday, Uncle Aaron,' and re 'please let me go to school this win-e Uncle Aaron?' I've had ye round ng as I'm going to stand you, so get up t git!" On the last word, the angry n, who had wrought himself up to a fu, put a deadly emphasis.

Father!"

he word fell with timid pleading from a tle crippled girl seated in a baby's high ir in the corner of the room. A woman st ing mush in an iron pot over the fire, wh was of wood on an open hearth, mi oned to the child to be still, but not be re her father had uttered a savage "ut-up there, Dolly! I'll not have you pl ding for beggar's brats. Jack's had hi chance, and he's lost it. The poor-hse is good enough for him. It 'll bring hi to his senses."

ck Wait staid to hear no more. His Ucle Aaron was his nearest living relati , his dead father's only brother, and th father had been a gentle, scholarly m , a preacher of the Gospel, who had di in harness, leaving his boy a charge o ne closest-fisted, hardest-hearted farmer in ll the country-side.

hree years of blows, neglect and conti al abuse on the part of Uncle Aaron, a of nagging and fault-finding from Aunt Kurah, had not inclined Jack to love ei er of them. But he did dearly love litt lame Dolly, whose blue eyes were b red with tears, as she reached out her m of a hand to bid him good-by. Dolly h been the one sunbeam in his hard lot.

Good-bye, Dolly!" The boy drew up h slender figure, and set the sturdy square ja. "When I am a rich man, I'll come ba in my carriage to see you!"

ncle Aaron sneered.

A pretty prospect of that, young man." Al he shut the door after his nephew's re ating form, then left the room he had bn sitting in, and went to the barn, unal , harsh as he was by nature and practi to endure the sight of Dolly's anguish-stken face.

Don't cry, Dolly," said the mother, "I'm gg to make fried cakes for supper, and I fry you a man, with raisins and cur-nts in the dough. You'll like that."

I'll never care for a fried man again," sbed Dolly. "It's awful mean for you a father to treat my Jack so. But God'll ta care of Jack. 'When my father and m mother forsake me then the Lord'll ta me up!'" And Dolly stopped crying, a looked out of the window, down the rd already white with the flakes of the fir snow which were falling fast.

would have been strange indeed had Aron Wait and his wife felt easy in their mds, when they reflected on what they h done to the ill-clad and lonely little fo w whom Providence had cast on their ca. Turning him adrift with his small bndle, they knew they had done a dastally deed, and by bed-time, both hoped hewould find his way back. But days a nights passed, and the boy was not heard from. The great white world of the snow had swallowed him up. Neighbors asked what had become of Jack, and, to save their own credit, the Waits gave false answers, and Dolly made no sign, only prayed for him more earnestly than ever, as she crept to her bed at dusk, or sat in her little chair with her book or her knitting, the live-long day.

So the years slipped by, in woven links of days and weeks.

* * * * * * *

When the lad turned his back on the only home he had on earth, it is idle to say that he felt depressed and discouraged. He did not know to whom to turn. His only plain thought was that he would die before he would go to the poor-house. In his pocket he had a silver dollar, and a lady's visiting card, a dainty engraved card, with the name in elegant script, of a young woman who had spent the summer in the mountains and to whom he had acted as guide when she went after pond-lilies and climbed the hills for golden-rod. He had rowed her in a boat, he had saddled her pony, and she had taken an interest in the boy, and told him if ever he could make his way to the distant city where she lived, he would find a friend in her. "Miss Lilla," he said over and over, "Miss Lilla." But one dollar would not carry him far on the road to her. Nevertheless, Jack Wait pluckily resolved to take the first step. He bought a ticket at the station, to which he trudged before the snow quite obliterated paths, for the point to which his money would entitle him to ride, and then he took a seat in the car, and cold and tired as he was, fell asleep. As he slept, the little slip of pasteboard, which he had held in his hand, fell to the floor, and was picked up by the father of the girl whose name it bore. So our chances make God's opportunities.

"One of Lilla's waifs, I fancy!" The gentleman said, surveying with amused scrutiny the boy, whose relaxed features, ragged clothing, and bare feet, told a pitiful story of poverty and desolation.

But Mr. Munroe would hardly have kept the boy in mind as he did, had not something happened which made the two companions in misfortune and dependent on one another.

The train swept around a curve in the darkness. There was a misplaced switch. Crash, whirl, jar, shrieks, groans! The flash of lanterns, the lifting of the dying and the cold snow on the wan countenances of the dead! Mr. Munroe found himself badly shaken and with an injured wrist. The little fellow who had Lilla's visiting card was close beside him, happily unhurt.

With the quick instinct of helpfulness, Jack gathered up the gentleman's wraps and his small travelling bag, and said "Lean on me, sir, till the doctors come this way," for in the twinkling of an eye, several doctors were on the spot, some from a village a few hundred yards off, and one or two who had been passengers on the wrecked train.

'Lean on me, Sir, till the doctors come,' said the boy.

"Lean on you, midget!" said tall Mr. Munroe. "I will that, but tell me, how you come to know my daughter Lilla. Ouch! but I cant talk, laddie; my wrist hurts like fire."

Mr. Munroe took Jack Wait home with him, fitted him out comfortably, and set him to work in his warehouse. Lilla taught him evenings, and presently, discovering his aptitude and desire to learn, persuaded her father to let him go to school regularly. He was warmly clothed, well fed, well housed, and grew accustomed to the warmth and peace of a real Christian home. Step by step, he worked his way, when school days were over, to a place of influence; there was nothing too hard for Jack to attempt, and in all that he did he was honest, diligent and thorough. Not in one year nor in ten, did he achieve wealth, but there came a day, when the word of the Lord which says, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men," was fulfilled in Jack Wait's case.

I drove past the great mansion where he lives now, one day last summer. There were green lawns bordered by scarlet geraniums, and watered by fountains, there were beds of flowers in bloom, and on the veranda children played. A carriage stood by the door, to which were harnessed a pair of cream-white horses with black manes and tails. Down the broad steps came a stalwart, fine-looking man, whose brown hair was just sprinkled with gray, and in his arms he carried a little figure pinched and pale and distorted with pain, but withal the figure of a sweet and loving woman, his cousin Dolly. Both her parents were dead, but Jack in his carriage had gone after and brought Dolly to his home, requiting the evil of his uncle and aunt with good, full measure, pressed down and running over. Jack's wife and children loved Dolly, and were very kind to her, and so was his adopted sister, Miss Lilla Munroe, whose whole life is a benefaction. It has grown up a harvest of blessing, the seed-time that was so scanty and bitter, for God, the orphan's friend, watched over and defended the one who had no helper save the Father in Heaven.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Unconscious Preaching.

Among some reminiscences of work among the Indian tribes of Canada by Rev. Egerton R. Young, whose portrait was published in this journal some time ago, is one, showing that in one case, at least, the silent example of patience and fortitude under suffering was more effective in winning a soul than the spoken sermon. Mr. Young says:

One old Indian, while very anxious to hear all he could of the stories and incidents of the good Book, was stubborn in his resolve not to become a Christian.

The missionary was disappointed. He felt that he had failed. To add to his trouble he was struck down with malarial fever and could not preach. The fever turned to typhoid and for weeks he hovered between life and death.

When health came back to him after being so long on his sick bed, utterly unable to attend to any of his duties, and he was able to enter again upon the work he so much loved, one of the first to greet him was this old Indian with the words "Missionary, I have made up my mind to be a Christian."

Great indeed was his joy at hearing these words, as his prayers and yearnings had so often gone out for this man's conversion, as he observed how intently he seemed to listen to all that was said. As it was but natural that he should desire to know what had induced this man, who had been so stubborn in his resolve not to be a Christian, now to make such a full and complete surrender, he questioned him as to the cause of this change in his mind towards Christianity.

His answer is worth remembering.

"You know," he said, "I often listened to you as you talked to us abont the stories and lessons in the great Book. Among other things you told us was that the Great Spirit who gave the Book was able to give us comfort for every kind of trouble, and could sustain us in sickness as well as in health, and keep us from fear and alarm, even in the presence of death itself.

"This was great news to me, and I could hardly believe it. And so when you were brought home sick and became so bad and seemed likely to die, I thought, 'Now I will see if what the missionary has told us is true in his own case.' So I used to go and sit in the room where you were and watch you and listen to your words, and although when the fever was on you, you said many queer things, yet, whenever your mind was right, you were kept without any fear or harm, and were so happy and joyous all the time. The prospect of death had no dread for you, so I said to myself, This is a religion worth having; and now I want to be a Christian, and have this same love in my heart which in the time of need will take all fear away."

THE POWER OF KINDNESS.

THERE is a tremendous power in a kind word. Although it may seem to be very insignificant, its force is indescribable and illimitable. Pungent and all conquering utterance: "A soft tongue breaketh the bone."

You have a dispute with your neighbor: You say to him "I despise you." He replies: "I can't bear the sight of you." You say to him: "Never enter my house again." He says: "If you come on my door-sill, I'll kick you off." You say to him: "I'll put you down." He says to you: "You are mistaken; I'll put you down." And so, the contest rages; and year after year you act the unchristian part. After a while the better spirit seizes you, and one day you go over to the neighbor and say: "Give me your hand. We have fought long enough. Time is so short, and eternity is so near, that we cannot afford any longer to quarrel. I feel you have wronged me very much; but let us settle all now in one great hand-shaking, and be good friends for all the rest of our lives." You have risen to a higher platform than that on which before you stood. You win his admiration, and you get his apology. But if you have not conquered him in that way, at any rate you have won the applause of your own conscience, the high estimation of good men, and the honor of your God, who died for His armed enemies.

"But," you say, "what are we to do when slanderers assault us, and there come acrimonious sayings all around about us, and we are abused and spit upon?" My reply is: Do not go and attempt to chase down the slanders. Lies are prolific, and while you are killing one, fifty are born. All your demonstrations of indignation only exhaust yourself. You might as well, on some summer, night when the swarms of insects are coming up from the meadows and annoying you and disturbing your family, bring up some great "swamp angel," like that which thundered over Charleston, and try to shoot them down. The game is too small for the gun. But what, then, are you to do with the abuses that come upon you in life? You are to live them down! I saw a farmer go out to get back a swarm of bees that had wandered off from the hive. As he moved amid them they buzzed around his head, and buzzed around his hands and buzzed around his feet. If he had killed one of them they would have stung him to death. But he moved in their midst in perfect placidity until he had captured the swarm of wandering bees. And so I have seen men moving amid the annoyances, and the vexations, and the assaults of life in such calm, Christian deliberation, that all the buzzing around about their soul amounted to nothing. They conquered them, and, above all, they conquered themselves.

O that we might in our families and in our Churches try the force of kindness! You can never drive men, women, or children into the Kingdom of God. A March northeaster will bring out more honey suckles than fretfulness and scolding will ever bring out Christian graces. I wish that in all our religious work we might be saturated with the spirit of kindness. Missing that, we miss a great deal of usefulness. There is no need in coming out before men and thundering to them the law, unless at the same time you preach to them the Gospel.

DESPONDENT WORK.

HOW poorly prepared for religious duty is a man who sits down under the gloom of expected misfortune. If he pray, he says, "I do not think I shall be answered." If he give, he says, "I expect they will steal the money." Dr. Chalmers, in the darkest hour of the history of the Free Church of Scotland, and when the woes of the land seemed to weigh upon his heart, said to his children, "Come, let us go out and play ball or fly kite," and the only difficulty in the play was that the children could not keep up with their father. Do not watch for evil. You will have nothing but misfortune in the future if you sedulously watch for it. How shall a man catch the right kind of fish if he arranges his line and hook and bait to catch lizards and water-serpents?

THE EVIL OF GOSSIP.

LET me persuade you to desist. Mount Taurus was a great place for eagles, and cranes would fly along that way, and they would cackle so loud that the eagles would know of their coming and they would pounce upon them and destroy them. It is said that the old cranes found this out and before they started on their flight they would always have a stone in their mouth so they could not cackle, and then they would fly in perfect safety. Be as wise as the old cranes and avoid the folly of the young cranes. Do not cackle.

If you are whispered about, slandered, abused in any circle of life, let me say for your encouragement that these whispers soon run out. They may do a little damage for a while, but after a while their detraction becomes a eulogy and people understand them just as well as though some one chalked all over their overcoat or their shawl these words, "Here goes a whisperer. Room for the leper. Room!" You go ahead and do your duty and God will take care of your reputation. How dare you distrust him? You have committed to him your souls. Can you not trust him with your reputation? Get down on your knees before God and settle the whole matter there That man whom God takes care of is well sheltered.

Let me charge you to make right and holy use of the tongue. It is loose at one end and can swing either way, but it is fastened at the other end to the floor of your mouth, and that makes you responsible for the way it wags. Xanthus, the philosopher, told his servant that on the morrow he was going to have some friends to dine, and told him to get the best things he could find in the market. The philosopher and his guests sat down the next day at the table. They had nothing but tongue—four or five courses of tongue—tongue cooked in this way and tongue cooked in that way, and the philosopher lost his patience and said to his servant, "Didn't I tell you to get the best thing in the market?" He said: "I did get the best thing in the market. Isn't the tongue the organ of sociality, the organ of eloquence, the organ of kindness, the organ of worship?"

Then Xanthus said: "To-morrow I want you to get the worst thing in the market." And on the morrow the philosopher sat at the table, and there was nothing there but tongue — four or five courses of tongue — tongue in this shape and tongue in that shape—and the philosopher again lost his patience and said: "Didn't I tell you to get the worst thing in the market?" The servant replied: "I did; for isn't the tongue the organ of blasphemy, the organ of defamation the organ of lying?"

Employ the tongue which God so wonderfully created as the organ of taste, the organ of deglutition, the organ of articulation, to make others happy, and in the service of God. If you whisper—whisper good — encouragement to the fallen and hope to the lost.

E. Mason, Germantown, Pa. How long did it take Noah to build the Ark?.

According to the ablest chronologists the order to make the Ark was given by the Lord to Noah about 2448 B.C., and the Ark was finished and it began to be filled with people and animals about 2340 B.C., a period of 99 years. (See Gen. 6:14 and Gen. 7; 1.)

C. E. Gower, Baldwin, Miss. As corn and wheat are so plentiful in the West would it not be a good idea to get up a ship-load for the starving Armenians. Farmers like myself would no doubt give grain, rather than the money, and the railroads might be induced to deliver same to some port free of charge.

The cost of transportation would be so great that it would not be advisable. Our Commissioner, Mr. Howard, has wisely suggested a plan of employment for the destitute, which has much more of helpfulness than charity, and Dr. Kimball of Van has already put a similar plan into successful operation.

Mrs. L., Westcalang, Pa. I would like to know why the Kurds are allowed to take everything from the Armenians and even their lives. Is there no government to protect them? We may send them help, but if they are not protected the Kurds may take it all from them as they have done in days of prosperity.

There is little danger of the Kurds or Turks taking from the Armenians such help as they receive from the Relief Fund, since it consists of food or clothing, for which they give some equivalent in labor, the Fund supplying the material, and giving the food, clothing and shelter as wages. Thus the original Fund is husbanded, to make it last as long as possible. Anyone sending a contribution to the Fund, may rest assured that Armenians and no others, will benefit by it.

T. K. New York City.—I am a young man, 21 years of age, was brought up by Christian parents, but have only been what I call a real Christian for the last year, during which, through special circumstances in my career, Our Father has brought me very close to him and has done so much for me. In business, I have been, as a young man, very successful according to the world's estimate of success, and lately I have been doing quite a good deal of mission work for Christ in the slum part of New York and my heart has warmed to the work, I would like to know if there is any institution or college, not too far away, which one can attend without a great outlay of money, and study for the mission field or for the ministry, or if there is any way of private study while continuing in business during the day. The greatest desire of my heart is that my life might be spent in work for my Master.

1. The construction of the frame-work of light buildings, the making of domestic utensils and strong rude, furniture. There were doubtless house carpenters, ship carpenters and other classifications, as now. 2. Much of the ground shows traces of volcanic origin. Nazareth was terraced and the houses were the ordinary flat-roofed, white structures of limestone, poorly lighted. 3. The usual light was a rush-light or other form of wick laid in a vase or lamp of olive oil with the lighted end projecting. In well-to-do homes however, they may have had tallow or wax candles.

W. S. Forsey, South Finch, Ont. What is meant by Heb. 7:3? Does it mean that Melchizedek was not human but of supernatural origin?

No; his being without father, mother, descent, etc., is understood as referring to the record. Nothing is known about them. The Levitical priests with whom he is put in contrast were very careful about the records of their genealogy. But this man of whom nothing is known, not even the names of his parents nor how long he lived, was so great Abraham, the ancestor of Levi, paid him h age and tithes which were the sign of a ognition of his priestly office. The ph "abiding ever" refers to the typical relatio Christ which the writer of the Epistle is plaining. He wants to show that Chris higher than the priests though he did not long to the tribe of Levi and he uses this stance as an illustration of the fact that t might be a higher priesthood outside the Le ical line.

East African Quarrels.

A WAR of succession has been raging in Eastern Africa since early summer, which has at last involved the British East Africa Company. Two Arab chiefs, Assiz and Naraka-bin-Raschid, aspired to the supreme authority, and after some fighting the question of the succession was submitted to the arbitration of Mr. Hardinge, the English Consul-General. His decision was against the Arab sheiks, who thereupon declared hostilities. Their uncle, Mbaruk-bin-Raschid, has been for some time in the receipt of an income from the British company, and an appeal was made to him to restrain the operations of his nephews. He informed the company that he could not control them, but said that if the British would send a small force to disarm them and their followers, he would render all the assistance in his power. An expedition was accordingly sent to Gazi, which is about seventeen miles south of Mombasa where the uncle said his nephews were encamped. On the arrival of the expedition it was found that Mbaruk was playing false. He was in league with his nephews and had joined forces with them. The combined army had moved to Mwele, seventeen miles farther inland. After occupying the deserted town of Gazi, the expedition proceeded to Mwele, where they found the enemy strongly intrenched on the crest of a hill. One large stockade and about fifty small ones had been erected. They were skilfully constructed, the plans of which the stockades were made being lined with high banks of earth loopholed for riflemen. The Arab warriors, kneeling behind the banks, could pour a raking fire into the attacking force, while the bullets of the expedition buried themselves harmlessly in the earth. It was necessary to carry the stockades at the point of the bayonet, and some severe fighting occurred before they were captured. The Arabs were well armed, and made a stubborn defence of their position. The native warriors with whom the British force was cooperating fought with great ferocity. After the battle, the stockades were destroyed and a path cut through the forest which covers the side of the hill. The enemy fled to Takaungu, but no attempt to pursue them was made. Whether they will renew hostilities or abandon their efforts to conquer the district is not known. The British are resisting the Arab rule wherever it is being forced on a people within their sphere of influence, as the Arab is a persistent slave-dealer, cruel and remorseless beyond any other race. The native African races are also guilty in this matter, and all are willing participants in the slave-trade. Though England is not disinterested in her interference in African affairs, her advance will inevitably benefit the peoples under her sway by protecting them from each other and from their Arab oppressors. In no part of the world has the truth of the Bible statement been more clearly proved than in the Dark Continent:

The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. (Ps. 74: 20.)

A Regenerate Bell.

In a recently published description of Cornell University is an interesting fact about its bell. It was a gift from a New York clergyman who said in presenting it that it was formerly suspended over a factory in England. When he was a lad, working in a blacksmith's shop in Leeds, the ringing of that bell was the signal for him to rise from his bed and go to work. He did not know its tone according to musical classification, but to him, in those days, it was positively hateful. Recently the factory had been demolished to make room for a reservoir for the city, and the clergyman, learning the fact, wrote to a friend to ask what would be done with the old bell. If it was to be broken up for old metal, he would like to have a piece of his old enemy to use as a paper-weight. His request was made known to the Mayor, who suggested to the council that it would be a graceful thing to present the clergyman with the whole bell. They agreed, and the bell was sent and was given to the University. The clergyman said it would be pleasant to him to think of the bell being employed for a new and better use than that to which its earlier days had been given. He should regard it as "a regenerate bell." It may be hoped that his wish is fulfilled, and that no one now has cause to think its sound hateful. Its tone is the same as in the old days, but if the students take a delight in their labor its sound cannot be unwelcome. The day is coming when everything will be consecrated to a nobler use, and as the prophet says:

There shall be upon the bells, Holiness unto the Lord. (Zech. 14: 20.)

An Enemy's Service.

A warm friendship between a citizen of Georgia and a veteran of the Union Army, which has continued for more than thirty years, had its origin in an incident recently described by the Georgian, in a speech reported by a Boston journal. The two men, then strangers to each other, were lying side by side on the scene of a skirmish near Winchester one night during the war. The Georgian was badly wounded and could not stand, but he knew something of surgery and was aware that his hurt was only a flesh wound. Near him lay a young man of about his own age, whose leg was severely cut. The pallor of his face and the blood flowing from his wound convinced the other that his life was one to be measured by minutes. He crawled to his side and spoke to him. "Tell my father—" gasped the dying man. The Georgian had an old father at home, and he felt for this man, though he was an enemy. He tore a strip off his uniform, and with that and a bit of wood made a tourniquet, which stopped the bleeding. Before morning both were carried to hospital, and with that strange affection that comes to every one who does another a great service, the Southerner hung around the other's bed and waited on him. He was sent away a prisoner to Fort Johnson before his protege fully recovered, and when they parted, the Union man gave him a card with his father's name and address in Washington on it, and the words, "This man saved my life; be kind to him for Charley's sake." It was more than six months after, when ragged, cold and hungry he reached Washington a released prisoner. He went to the address on the card. But a man wearing the Southern uniform was not welcome there, and he was ordered away. But he presented the card, and immediately there was a change of manner. He slept in Charley's bed that night, had Charley's place at table, and when he left, he wore a suit of Charley's clothes and had money in his pocket. He had made some of the best friends of his life. They would do anything "for Charley's sake." The story shows what people will do even for an enemy when a beloved son pleads for him, and it should encourage us to go to God and ask his help with confidence, knowing that Jesus said:

Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name he will give it you. (John 16: 23.)

Music in Life.

A curious physiological argument, based on anatomical discoveries, is presented in the New York Herald by an eminent physician. He contends that human life is based on subtle harmonies the suspension of which produces hypnotism, or unconsciousness, and if continued, means death. He says that the terminations of the nerves on which all the senses of hearing, sight, taste, touch and smell depend, are arranged like the keys of a piano, or the pipes of an organ. In the ear, for instance, they hang from the myriad arches of the inner ear like seaweed touching a miniature ocean and responding to the vibrations of sound. The millions of points in the retina of the eye and the corpuscles in the inside of the hand, the hair cells of the nose and the taste-buds of the tongue, are all arranged with a rythmical design as palpable as the notes on a sheet of music. In a healthy state the beat of the pulse and the respiration mark a similar scale of music and respond to mental emotion, rising and falling as distinctly as an operatic score. To this statement the spiritual man would add that the one note of discord that destroys the harmony of nature is sin; and that the truest happiness can come to a man only as his whole nature is attuned to God's nature. The surest way to a harmonious life extending to a happy eternity, is the course urged by Job's friend:

Acquaint now thyself with him and be at peace. (Job 22: 21.)

A Mountain on Fire.

A dispatch from Fort Townsend, Wash., reports the arrival there of the exploring party recently sent to Mount Olympus. The expedition originated in the stories brought by travelers that they had seen volumes of smoke and flame issuing from the top of the mountain. As it had not been supposed that it was a volcano, an investigation was ordered. The expedition was unable to ascend the mountain, on account of the intense heat and the blinding smoke enveloping it. The explorers, however, satisfied themselves that the phenomenon is not volcanic. They are convinced that there are large veins of lignite coal extending through the mountain, and that these have become ignited and are burning fiercely. They think that the deep gorges of the mountain have in time become full of fallen trees, which have in some unexplained way, caught fire and communicated the flame to the veins of coal. The perpetual snow which in years past crowned the peak has now melted away, and the rivulets, have turned into steam and joined the column of smoke plainly visible from Fort Townsend. If this theory is correct, the mountain is not, as was suggested, a channel for the world's interior fires, but is being itself consumed. Analogous conditions exist in human nature. If there were no fire of hell in God's universe, sin working in a human being would eventually produce suffering of which the everlasting fire spoken of in the Bible is a type.

Wickedness burneth as the fire. (Isa. 9: 18.)

A Series of Gospel Meetings has Just Closed in Liberty, Mo., in which Evangelist Layfield of Kansas City did most effective work, assisted by Rev. I. H. Herberner. There was a tent which [illegible] sometimes estimated at 2,000 or more.

Mrs. Ballington Booth of the Salvation Army is having a busy time in California. A Western journal records the following as one day's work: Mrs. Booth addressed the prisoners at San Quentin State prison at 8 A. M., conducted a consecration service at Calvary Presbyterian Church, San Francisco, at 11 o'clock, and lectured there at 3 P. M. on the "Slum and Rescue Work of the Army"; and in the evening delivered an address in the First Congregational Church. Over 2,000 were present at the last named service, occupying every inch of space.

Evangelistic Services are being held in the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral, Montreal, by Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, the celebrated English mission preacher, who held the noon services some years ago in Trinity Church, New York.

A Conference for Bible Study in Relation to the second coming of Christ will be held in the Central Baptist Church, Brooklyn, Nov. 18 to 21. Among the speakers who have promised to take part are: Dr. A. C. Dixon, Brooklyn; Prof. J. M. Steiffler of Crosier University, Rev. Robert Cameron and Rev. H. C. Mabie of Boston, Mass.; Rev. I. M. Haldeman, New York, and Rev. W. T. Chase of Philadelphia.

An Interesting Course of Study is in Progress at the Chicago Bible Institute conducted by Dr. A. T. Pierson, who lectures each morning this month. While not usually receiving students at this season for brief periods special arrangements are made to accept such young women as can enter for a three months' term, in order that they may avail themselves of the exceptional opportunity of hearing Dr. Pierson. Further information may be obtained by addressing Miss E. S. Strong, 250 La Salle avenue, Chicago.

The Death of Miss Linda Gilbert, the Prisoners' friend, is announced. She had been ill since the middle of October, but was thought to be recovering when a fit of apoplexy closed her useful life. For more than a quarter of a century she had given her money, time and ceaseless labor to the work of benefiting criminals while they were in jail and helping them to earn a honest living after they were released. She established libraries in the prisons of Illinois, Missouri and New York. Over three thousand prisoners received aid from her in starting a new life after their release.

The "Missionary Review" Tells the Story of the unexpected conversion of a prominent Hindu in the Punjaub. He sought a private interview with the missionary, who expected a fierce expression of hostility, and was amazed when the man pulled out a New Testament and said: "Sahib, I have read this book, and find it to be pure and holy. Up to ten days ago I was a bitter opponent of yours. I resolved that I would expose your book. So I began to read it in order to pick faults in it; but, do you know, as I read I was drawn to it. My heart was captivated, and now I cannot oppose you. I know God's light is in that book."

Miss Frances E. Willard Advocated at the recent convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union the adoption of a platform including woman suffrage, the election of president, vice president and U. S. senators by the direct vote of the people, the free and unlimited coinage of silver and the State ownership of industries which are now or are liable to become monopolies. The convention adopted the several planks practically as outlined. It is thought that in the East the [illegible] free silver plank will operate unfavorably on the interests of the W. C. T. U. A disposition was manifested on the part of several influential members to exclude from the platform all political matters not directly connected with temperance.

The Family and Home Circle

IN HINDU HOMES.

Some of the Strange Customs and Observances—A Hindu Wedding Ceremony.

THERE is quite as wide a distinction between the homes of the rich and the poor Hindu families of India as exists between those of the millionaire and the mechanic in our own land. Usually the poor have a single apartment which they can call their own. Once a week the walls are smeared over with a most unfragrant solution, which is said to be healthy. The rich, on the other hand have elegant dwellings, containing many apartments, the walls of each being covered with paintings and frescoes. But however fine the home may be, the Hindu mother, unless, indeed, she belong to royalty, or at least nobility, is not too proud to do her own cooking and house-cleaning. After a cleaning, the good housewife rarely fails to ornament the front door with a solution of lime or chalk, in the form of a lotus leaf—a flower held sacred by all Hindus, and which is supposed to bestow a magical charm on the dwelling.

Hindu women are invariably neat and spotless in their personal attire. Most of them are devoted to their temple duties. The Hindu sacraments are ten in number, and each is observed with the utmost ceremony. Offerings are made to the various gods and goddesses of rice, sugar and ghee (clarified butter), oil, flowers and lighted tapers, as well as gold, silver and cotton.

One of the most solemn of all the sacraments is marriage. Among the different castes the time for marriage varies, but usually the bride is over ten years of age and the bridegroom over sixteen. Our illustration on this page represents a Buddhist wedding ceremony. Before the husband can be presented to his future wife (whom he may see at the altar for the first time) he is expected to prepare himself by certain ceremonies and ablutions. Of course he has been informed beforehand of all her charms of person and of her accomplishments. At the ceremony he is robed almost wholly in white, and anointed with oil. He wears garlands of fresh flowers, and accompanied by friends he goes to the bride's house, where he is welcomed by her father. If the future wife appears at all at this meeting she is closely veiled. On the afternoon of the wedding day the company assemble at the bride's father's house. There is a raised platform at one end of the hall, upon which the bridegroom and the priests take their places. Then the bride enters, accompanied by her father, who places her at the bridegroom's right hand. A young priest brings forward a large censer, containing a charcoal fire, emblematical of the warmth of their love. Two priests stand before them, each bearing a lighted torch, and recite some beautiful prayers. Then the bride treads thrice on a stone or "muller" (a grinder for rice and wheat), indicating that she is about to assume the cares and responsibilities of vifehood. The bridegroom next makes an offering of oil and frankincense in gratitude to the gods for the blessing of a good wife. A priest hands him a torch, which he waves three times around the bride, typical of the love that will henceforth surround her. The bride then scatters a handful of rice and drops a little oil as an oblation to the gods. Meanwhile a chant is recited or sung by the temple attendants. The father approaches and clothes the bride, over her own garments, with two outer coverings, and he then fastens the end of her dress to the skirt of her husband, and placing her hand in his, ties it with a cord made of sacred grass, typifying the strength and delicacy of the marriage tie. The young bride steps seven times around the sacred fire, repeating the prescribed marriage vows, the priests chant a nuptial hymn and the ceremony is ended. Some of the language of the ceremony is said to be very beautiful.

In a high-caste Hindu home there are many servants, and although the wife has numerous duties of her own, the presence of so many retainers naturally multiplies work. The "khan-saurat" (butler) and the "kling" (cook) are the most important. Besides these are the "bultee-wallah" (lamplighter), the dhoby (washerman), "bheestie" (bath-tub man), "jarroo-wallah" (house-sweeper), and others almost without number. Indeed, so numerous are they in some establishments, that it seems as though there were a separate servant for everything required to be done in the household.

Arabia's Laughing Plant.

This plant is a native of Arabia, and its seeds produce on any one eating them effects analagous to those of laughing gas. The flowers are produced in clusters, and are yellow in color; the seed-pods contain two or three black seeds of the shape and size of French beans. Their flavor is slightly like that of opium and tastes sweet, while their odor produces a sickening sensation. The seeds are pulverized and taken in small doses. Anyone taking them begins to laugh loudly and boisterously, and then sings, dances and cuts all kinds of fantastic capers, the effect continuing for about an hour. When the excitement ceases the exhausted individual falls into a deep sleep, on awakening from which he is utterly unconscious of any such demonstrations having been made under the influence of the seeds of the laughing plant.

Artists and Children.

Many of the most famous artists were men of family and not only loved their children, but delighted to use them as models. Romney, Gainsborough, Hoppner, Reynolds—to say nothing of Rubens, Van Dyck, and many others—enjoyed the advantages of having lovely young models in their own families. Sir Joshua Reynolds enjoyed the most abounding sympathy with juvenile sitters. The stories of Sir Joshua's very felicitous talent for winning the good graces of his little sitters would fill a page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Of all his famous works, none have excited more interest or admiration than his portraits of children.

One of the finest portraits of youthful royalty ever painted, is that given on this page. It represents Princess (now Queen) Vicria at her geography lesson. The pose is easy and natural, and the general effect, peculiarly pleasing. It is in no sense an ambitious painting, yet its simple charm is such, that it is to-day valued more highly than all other pictures of the young girl who afterward became the sovereign of a great nation.

In Koordish Homes.

The Koords, writes Dr. Jesse M. Yonan of Persia, who has known them all his life, are profoundly ignorant and stupid, with neither books nor schools. Of the whole race, not one in ten thousand can read. The most of the summer they live in tents in the cool places on the mountain slopes and valleys. "Their winter houses are built underground most of them having a single room with one or two small holes on the top for light. This serves for a bedroom, parlor, kitchen and stable. In the daytime they are all away; towards sunset they come in one by one, at least about a score of them, men, women and children, but already the hens have found their resting place; sheep, oxen and horses, each in their corner. After it is quite dark, coarse stale bread and sour milk are brought out for supper. Two spoons and one big dish are sufficient for all; each in his turn tries a spoon. Of course, this is always done in the dark, as they have no light. Now it is bedtime, and one after another finds his place under the same quilt, without a pillow or bed, except some hay spread on the floor. In a few minutes all are fast asleep, and soon the heavy breathing and snoring of men and cattle is mingled, and the effect is anything but a sweet sound. The temperature of the room is sometimes high as a hundred degrees and it swarms with fleas, which attack the wild Koord, but he stirs not till morning. Their women wear an exceedingly picturesque costume. They have dark complexions, with eyes and hair intensely black. Their beauty is not of a refined type, but by a mass of paint is made sufficiently attractive for their easily pleased husbands. Almost all the work, both in and out doors, is done by them. Early in the morning, when they are through their home work, they hasten to the field to tend the flocks, or gather fuel for use in winter. In the evening they come in with large burdens on their backs, which appear to be quite enough for two to carry. So industrious are they that they frequently spin on their way to the fields."

LITTLE WITNESSES.

TELL me pilgrim, faint and weary,
Traveling o'er this pathway dim,
Are you shedding light around you,
Are you witnessing for Him?

Do you try to tell the story
Of the precious Saviour's love?
Are you hungering and thirsting
Evermore your love to prove?

Are you seeking out the lost ones
Whom the Master died to win?
Are you showing them the fountain
That can wash away their sins?

Have you made a consecration
Of your time and earthly store?
If your all is on the altar,
Then the Master asks no more.

Thus, O pilgrim, should we journey
Showing forth the Master's praise
With our lamps all trimmed and burning,
That the world may catch their rays.

A Child Inebriate.

One of the most striking temperance sermons ever published, and one that is a lesson to mothers everywhere, is related of an Italian family in New York. A little five-year old girl—a mere baby—is lying in the alcoholic ward of a public hospital in that city, actually dying of strong drink. It was disclosed that her mother had been in the habit of giving her frequent doses of whiskey during her babyhood, to keep her quiet, and she became so accustomed to it that now it is a second nature. Like many other acquired and unnatural tastes, it is a ruling passion with the poor child, and it would melt a heart of stone to gaze on the wee, emaciated frame, the lack-lustre eyes, and the shaking hand of this infant drunkard, who, to avert acute suffering, has to be fed with a stimulating tonic several times a day. The doctors say she has only a few more weeks to live. Lucia is so weak and fragile, and her little limbs are so wasted, that the nurses are not surprised that the doctors should pronounce the case hopeless.

Lucia's parents, who are responsible for the fate of their little girl, are dissipated people. As soon as the child could walk she was sent to saloons for liquor, and she shared in her parents' debauches like any old and seasoned drinker. Now she suffers from a complication of diseases, chiefly of the stomach and liver, that is directly due to the liquor habit. A sad feature of the case is that her parents do not seem to be able to realize that they have done any wrong in turning the pure innocence of childhood into a vile and brutish slavery to the alcohol habit. Surely such a case should operate as a warning to careless parents who do not give sufficient attention to the habits of their children.

PRAISE AND PURPOSE.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Nov. 24. Psalm 116.

GRATITUDE is a debt no man can afford to leave unpaid. To do so disgraces him in his own eyes as well as in the opinion of other people. It is not always possible to repay a benefactor for services rendered, to do to him as he has done to us, but when the service has been good, there ought always to be the disposition to repay; not to get rid of the obligation, but to reciprocate the brotherly kindness. The opportunity of serving a benefactor may be of quite a different order from the one he has used to serve us, but there should be the disposition to take advantage of the opportunity, whatever it may be. A wealthy man may come to the rescue of another in a financial crisis, and may never need such help; but he may be in need of a service that all his money could not buy, and then comes the opportunity for the poor man to show the rich one that he is grateful. There are some obligations so enormous that they can never be repaid. During the war there were several instances of one friend saving the life of another at the cost of mutilation to himself. But even with those, grateful affection counts for much and cannot be withheld without disgrace. Every man owes it to himself, to his own self-respect and his own honor to be grateful for favors received.

Our relation to God, so different in all respects from our relations to each other, involves the same principle. It is mean to take no acknowledgment of the blessings that come to us from his hand. Everyone is conscious that he enjoys good things that he has not earned. There are many who boast that they are "self-made men," that every dollar they have has been won by their own exertions; but even the self-made man did not make his own intellect, he could only improve and develop that which was given to him. His power to work, his energy, his natural talents were given to him, and all along his life he has enjoyed blessings that have come to him from some other source. The fact calls for gratitude. But beyond these gifts that come to the evil and to the good, there is with many of us a special relation demanding a special return. The Psalmist, whose words form the basis of the Topic, recounts an experience, of which many have had a parallel. This man had been in trouble, he had been sorrowful, he had been weeping, was brought low, had been near death, and had had occasion to say that all men were liars. It was a sinful experience evidently, though the cause is not detailed, but it is not an uncommon one. In every city, any day, in our own time, hundreds could easily be found in those circumstances. In this situation the ancient poet says he prayed, he asked God to deliver his soul. Men are apt to do that in a crisis. God heard and delivered him; he kept his feet from falling, loosed his bonds, and helped him. In that, too, the experience is by no means solitary. Multitudes have had reason to declare that their prayers have been heard and answered. How many are there who have travelled over the same road as the ancient poet, who, make the resolve that he did? "I love the Lord," he declares; "I will walk before him; I will pay my vows; I am his servant; I will pay the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and pay it in public. What shall I render to him?" Thus speaks the grateful man, but he is in a small company.

IN THY HAND.

FATHER, I know that all my life
Is portioned out to me:
The changes that are sure to come
I do not fear to see;
I ask Thee for a present mind,
Intent on pleasing Thee.

I would not have the restless will
That hurries to and fro,
Seeking for some great thing to do,
Or secret thing to know:
I would be treated as a child,
And guided where I go.

Wherever in the world I am,
In whatsoe'er estate,
I have a fellowship with hearts
To keep and cultivate,
A work of lowly love to do
For the Lord on whom I wait.—WARING.

WAITING.

I AM waiting for the dawning
Of the bright and blessed day,
When the darksome night of sorrow
Shall have vanished far away,

When forever with the Saviour,
Far beyond this vale of tears,
I shall swell the song of worship
Through the everlasting years.

I am waiting for the coming
Of the Lord who died for me:
Oh, his words have thrilled my spirit,
"I will come again for thee."

I can almost hear his foot-fall,
On the threshold of the door,
And my heart, my heart is longing
To be his for evermore.

WHEN CHRIST COMES.

What will be the Condition of the World and the Church at the Second Advent.

An Address by REV. A. FAUSSET.

WHEN Christ comes will he find faith on the earth? Will the preaching of his Gospel have so led the world to his feet as that there will be a general and enthusiastic welcome of him? Will men be living in such a way as that they will be glad to see him? or will they be stricken with fear and consternation by his approach? These are important questions.

We gain some light on the subject by Paul's epistles to Timothy. As to the latter days when the end of the dispensation is coming near, Paul sketches the kind of teaching there will be (1. Tim. 4: 1-3). I think you cannot mistake what is meant in this prophecy by "the speaking lies in hypocrisy, forbidding to marry, commanding to abstain from meats. So completely have the mediæval churches, the Apostate Greek and Roman churches, fulfilled this prediction, as to pronounce it a mortal sin to partake of meat on certain days. And then as to the forbidding to marry, we have listened till we are tired of the talk about the celibacy of the clergy.

But in the second epistle (3: 1-9), we come to a further and a different stage; we come there upon characteristics which seem to be beginning to be fulfilled even to-day, before our very eyes—"Men shall be lovers of their own selves;" the idol self shall be set up—a different form of idolatry from the old mediæval idols. They are no longer to have pictures and winking Virgins, but "covetousness, which is idolatry." They are described as "covetous boasters;" here we have a mouth speaking great things—the vauntings of science: "Proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents:" we have this characteristic sadly amongst us: instead of reverence to those who are elders, we have an impatience of authority on the part of those that are young. Then we go on—"unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of all that is good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God."

And there is a remarkable allusion to the magicians—"Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth." Have we nothing parallel to this, no pretensions to dealings with the unseen world? Is there no spiritualism amongst us? Oh! we have here a safeguard as against everything else. Look at Isa. viii. 19, "And when they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep, and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? for the living to the dead?" We have to fall back upon the written Word of God when we see before us signs, and lying wonders, and miracles! We are told in Matt. xxiv. that there shall be signs and wonders and lying miracles, and that if it were possible they shall deceive even the very elect; and in 1 Thess. we read that the coming of the Man of Sin will be with "signs and lying wonders." We have it also in Rev. 13, where the Beast performs the part of prime minister of evil, supporting the claims of the first Beast." And what shall we do then? Why fall back upon the written Word and say, "If an angel from heaven declare any other Gospel than that we have received, let him be accursed." So shall we be ready for his appearing.

...NADJA;...

A Tale of the Russian Steppes.*

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

"MIKHAIL AND NADJA LOOKED PITYINGLY ON AS THE SURGEON EXAMINED HIM."

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Crescent and the Cross.

SERGEANT BORISOFF was Sergei's right-hand man in military matters, a tough old veteran who had seen twenty years of arduous service in all parts of the Czar's dominions. In he came through the tent door with his hand at the salute, his tattered overcoat bound round with an improvised red belt, from which hung his long cavalry sabre.

"At your service, Highborn."

"The Bashi Bazouks are coming up one of the gorges Wednesday morning at daybreak. We must'nt let them up the Plitchenti. The general says we are to stay here at any cost. Do you understand?"

"I understand, Highborn."

He at once ordered a parade. As Sergei went along the lines examining each man carefully he could not help smiling occasionally at the ludicrous array of rags and bones before him, at the gay faces worn by misery and wretchedness, at the sorry force from which such brave things were expected at daybreak on Wednesday. He called attention and they drew themselves up stiffly.

"Now, brave lads," he began, "Attention! We have all day to-day and to-morrow to prepare for one of the stiffest fights we ever had. Three hundred Bashi Bazouks are to attempt this pass on Wednesday morning at daybreak. They have been scouring about among the villages there below us, slaughtering and pillaging and worse. Shall we run away and let them come on?"

A thunderous "No" from every man present greeted Sergei's question. The troopers grasped their sabres and the infantry swung their rifles high in the air.

"God bless you, boys! To your tents. Get everything ready. Parade at daybreak Thursday."

"God bless you, Highborn!"

It was late on Tuesday afternoon that one of the scouts came breathlessly running in with the news that a considerable body of Turkish irregular horse was slowly making its way across the plain towards the mountains.

In a moment the little camp was in a state of wild excitement. Sergei carefully studied the position of affairs and decided to withdraw his men from the forepost and concentrate all his strength to guard the narrower part of the defile where his principal force lay. Sentries were posted across the valley just below the camp.

The day had been warm and by no means clear. Towards evening snow began to come down in great slow-falling flakes. At eight o'clock Sergei ordered prayers. The side flaps of his tent were drawn up and every available man of the little garrison was either inside the dimly-lighted tent, squatting near where Mikhail stood with his open book, or else outside in the dark, with the snow settling down on their gray great-coats. As Sergei entered every man stood up. Mikhail began the service. The great gaunt fellows bowed their heads in holy reverence. The wonderful words read with Mikhail's low, sweet voice went straight to their hearts.

"Now," said Mikhail, "we will stand silent for a few minutes, and each of us will present to the Almighty all that he has on his heart."

They stood there in the dark in the falling snow, silent and awe-stricken. "All well," came from a rock high above them, and faintly answered and still more faintly re-answered. Sergei took Mikhail's place. All heads were bent. A few men were ou their knees in the snow.

"Our Father, which art in heaven," began the young officer.

"Our Father, which art in heaven," came in soft, hoarse response from the brave fellows who were to meet death on the morrow.

Sergei solemnly recited the whole prayer.

"For Thine is the Kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever," said Sergei bravely.

"For Thine is the Kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever," answered the men with quivering voices.

"Amen," whispered Sergei.

"Amen," came the response, so soft and low as hardly to be heard.

"Brothers, good-bye until three. God give you a good sleep. Parade at three."

They slowly dispersed. But there was no sleep that night.

At three the bugle sounded. The snow was still falling, but the wind was now again tearing down the defile in short, sharp gusts, blowing the snow about in clouds. The men tumbled out of their tents and quickly and silently took up the positions assigned them. They were all blithe, alert, sanguine.

Perfect order reigned among Sergei's little company of devoted fellows. Those stationed on the western slope of the defile began to notice the higher rocks above them touched with the first faint gray light of dawn. The Russians could just discern through the driving mist and snow the moving forms of the enemy. They could see a bright sash here and there, and sometimes a swart face glowing under its bashlik.

The Turks advanced a few paces further, and sharp and clear rang out the bugle. A rattle of musketry from a hundred rifles was the almost instantaneous reply, followed by a blood-curdling yell, the battle cry of the Bashi Bazouks. The Turks were evidently unprepared for resistance. The Russians had expected three hundred of the enemy—they were over five hundred strong. After three unsuccessful attempts to force the defenders of the pass from their position, the Turks, who had suffered terrible losses, abandoned concerted action and clambered up among the rocks to dislodge the Russians, each man fighting for his own hand. A terrible series of bloody encounters now began. Outnumbered in the proportion of three to one, Sergei's men began to fall back on the redan. Many a brave fellow of them dropped. The air was filled with the crackle of muskets and the frantic cries of the Bashi Bazouks as they rushed like maniacs on their foes. Slowly, surlily, the Russians retired, gradually hemmed in in front and on both wings. Every inch of the ground they stubbornly contested, their numbers gradually thinning.

"Will the reinforcements never come?" asked Sergei. "Can this last much longer?"

The remnants of his men had now obtained the shelter of the redan. The Turks had drawn off to a distance. Sergei, gravely anxious, lay awaiting their next move. He knew if they carried the mound all would be lost. Suddenly the Turks put themselves again in line of attack and rushed toward the mound.

"Steady, boys!" sang out the brave Sergei, "Steady!"

"God be with you, High-born."

On came the Turks yelling like demons, their eyes flashing with the fierce frenzy of battle.

The mad cries of passion and hate, the crash of blows, the sharp rattle of the rifles, the sickening thud of bayonet stabs, yells of entreaty and agony—it is indescribable.

In the midst of it all again Sergei's voice, strong, jubilant.

"Our brothers are coming down the hill, boys. I hear their bugles. Thank God! Thank God!"

And nearer and nearer loomed the steel-grey coats; the steady bugling, became louder and louder. And the Turks, looking up, seeing that their case was hopeless, sprang down the glacis of the redan pell-mell, scoured down the glen to where their horses were picketed, and fled from Plitchenti.

The ragged, bleeding remnant in the redan were crying and laughing with joy, and clasping the hands of their deliverers and kissing them and joining in the choruses of the songs. And their deliverers pointed up the hill to pack-horses bringing sheep-skins and many another luxury.

CHAPTER XIX.

In Hospital.

The Countess and Nadja made a bustling and uncomfortable journey from Kief south to the Roumanian capital. Arrived at the Danube, our two heroines had their first sight of the stern, terrible realities of war. Only three short months before and the Russian armies had crossed the river at Simnitza and other points, full of ardent hope and buoyancy and courage; and now long, slow-moving trains of ambulance wagons were coming back full of mangled and bleeding men and boys, groaning tortured wretches, ruined, wrecked, hopeless.

It was here, with the slow-rolling monotonous Danube, not far away, that Olga and Nadja received their first instruction as Red Cross sisters. More than once they quailed and sickened; but the knowledge that the misery and anguish around them was incalculable, and that their work and presence might help to assuage it, buoyed them up and strengthened them.

As the Russian armies penetrated into Turkish territory, the hospital near the Danube was set apart for convalescents, and the greater part of the field-surgeons and nurses were ordered south to Radova, to the scene of active war. Nadja and Olga, with a score of others, jolted in rough springless carts over the frosty roads of Bulgaria.

At Radova things were worse than on the Danube. The disorder and confusion were appalling. To speak of the sickening discomforts to which Olga and her companion were subjected, would be, perhaps, out of place. They were not seeking comfort. The surgeons here, as almost everywh on the Russian side, performed miracles devoted heroism, many of them pale a emaciated as their patients, from unren ting, grinding toil and want of sleep. that could be done for the brave fello lying wounded, they did.

A long hut, roughly constructed tarred wood, and banked up all rou with snow, was placed under Olg charge. Two or three iron stoves, tl pipes venting acrid wood smoke at ev joint, imparted a little warmth to wretched shed. The walls trickled with sweat. Melting snow dropped h and there from the roof, and it seeme matter of indifference whether the drops fell on the beds or on the muc path up the centre of the hut. Such be Boards were in rows on the damp grou and on these were placed coarse str bolsters. The bags of straw were pac so close together that there was bar space for the surgeons and nurses to p between them. Everything was stai and smeared with those terrible dark splashes, and the heavy odor of chl form, iodoform, and many another dr hung about the place. This was the cers' hospital. Fifty badly-wounded r lay here. Twenty of them were to die

For a month and more, Olga and Na labored in this fœtid shed. It was an ful experience. As each bed became cant it was at once occupied with a fr case. There was no rest, no relief- ways the same unvarying picture of hur agony. But as the cold weather bec intenser, active hostilities diminished, towards Christmas the nurses found t duties a trifle lighter. Their respite, h ever, was only of short duration. A QUESTION AT A BALL.

A correspondent of the Indian Witness, warning its Christian readers against dancing, relates the following incident:

A young lady of my acquaintance in a city of India, was preparing to join the church and felt the solemnity of the vows she was about to make; at once she gave up dancing, and in vain worldly friends urged her to join in this amusement; but, meeting a Christian lady, by whom she was told that "dancing was no harm," she, being very fond of the amusement, returned to it. She still regarded herself as a Christian, and would certainly have resumed dancing but for her friend's assurance that there was "no harm" in it. At a ball shortly afterward she asked her partner in the dance, "Are you a Christian?" His reply was, "No; are you, or you would not be here!" She quitted the ball-room and sought counsel from another Christian lady, who spoke of pleasures that were everlasting and led her to Jesus.

She felt dancing to quite be out of the question, and has since then been satisfied with the joy she has in Christ. It is no self-denial to stay away from the dance, for she has higher pleasure in him.

A SAILOR'S TRACTS IN MEXICO.

A missionary in Mexico attributes much of his success there to the pioneer work done by means of tracts sent out by the American Tract Society in the sailing vessels which occasionally visit that coast in search of logwood or mahogany. He says: "Only a few days ago a father presented himself and his family in San Juan Bautista as candidates for church-membership, and when I asked the history of his conversion he told me that seven years ago a sailor from New York had given him some of these tracts, by means of which he was brought to a knowledge of Christ and stimulated to purchase a Bible, and that from that time he had labored as opportunities were afforded to spread the pure light of the Gospel among his benighted and depraved fellow-countrymen. From others I learned that he had long enjoyed this reputation, and was widely esteemed."

For Dyspepsia and Exhaustion Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. E. CORNELL ESTEN, Philadelphia, Pa., says: "I have met with the greatest and most satisfactory results in dyspepsia and general derangement of the cerebral and nervous system, causing debility and exhaustion."

How it looks, to the women who wash with Pearline, when they see a woman washing in the old-fashioned way with soap—rubbing the clothes to pieces, rubbing away her strength, wearing herself out over the washboard! To these Pearline women, fresh from easy washing, she seems to "wear a fool's cap unawares."

Everything's in favor of Pearline—easier work, quicker work, better work, safety, economy. There's not one thing against it. What's the use of washing in the hardest way, when it costs more money? 489

MILLIONS NOW USE PEARLINE

10 Dollars for 3.50

..IF YOU BUY NOW..

A Ten-Dollar set of Shakspeare for $3.50. We mean exactly what we say. This set is worth $10 to any reader, no matter how many other editions he may have. We shall sell it direct for a short time only at $3.50, and any one who is dissatisfied may have his money back. These books can never be bought any cheaper. Never as cheap again. In our next announcement the price will be advanced. (The regular price of the set is $10.)

This is a Shakspeare for readers. It is the only edition printed in large type. It is strongly bound in good serviceable cloth binding, in eight handsome volumes of easily handleable size. Paper specially made with a dead surface, restful to the eyes. There are copious notes on the text by J. Payne Collier, F. S. A., the celebrated Shakspearian critic, with variorum readings. We honestly believe it to be the best edition ever printed for actual use. We published it to retail at $10. That allowed for the retailer's and the jobber's profit. The reader buying direct from us can have both of these profits. We can't afford to sell very long at $3.50, which is less than the wholesale price. The object of this special $3.50 offer is to make a quick test of whether the discriminating readers of this paper, who will appreciate a large, clear type, scholarly edition of Shakspeare, complete, are ready to buy direct from the manufacturers at a saving of more than half the cost. If you are, the middle-men's profit is yours. Order to day and be sure of getting the lowest price that will ever be quoted. Size of each volume 6x9 inches, one inch thick. More than four thousand pages.

ROCKPORT, MAINE.

KEYSTONE PUBLISHING CO.,

Gentlemen—I am highly pleased with your ten-dollar edition of Shakspeare. It is just what I have been looking for for several years past. The type is large, clear and plain, the volumes of convenient size, and the annotations helpful. I can cheerfully recommend it to any lover of Shakspeare, and especially to men of my age whose eyesight begins to fail.

I thank you for having placed such an edition on the market, at a price within the reach of the poorest of us.

Very truly yours,
C. F. RICHARDS,
Treasurer Camden Savings Bank,
Rockport, Maine.

NEWINGTON, N. H.

KEYSTONE PUBLISHING CO.,

Gentlemen—I have received and examined the eight-volume set of Shakspeare which you shipped me. I am agreeably surprised at the attractiveness of the binding and the clearness of the type. The size of the volumes is very convenient and particularly adapted for use in Shakspeare Clubs. I have shown my set to members of the Newington Club. I will ask you as a favor to ship me five more sets of your $10 edition of Shakspeare, for which you will find money order enclosed. I consider them wonderfully cheap at the price you are advertising them, and heartily recommend them to any one who may desire to own a beautiful set of Shakspeare's works.

Yours truly, MISS FLORENCE HOYT.

Slavery in Morocco.

A member of the North Africa Mission sends the following urgent appeal through the Christian press of Europe:

"Few people know the true state of affairs in Morocco; only those who live in daily touch with the common life of the people really get to understand the pernicious and soul-destroying system of human flesh-traffic, as carried on in most of the public markets of the interior. Having traded and travelled extensively in Morocco for some seven years, I feel constrained to bear witness against the whole ugly of Arab slave-raiders and buyers of poor little innocent boys and girls.

When I first settled in Morocco I met those who denied the existence of slave-markets, but since that time I have seen children, some of whom were of tender years, as well as young women, openly sold in the city of Morocco, and in the towns along the seaboard. It is also of daily frequent occurrence to see slaves sold in Fez, the capital of Northern Morocco.

The first slave girls that I actually saw being sold were of various ages. They had just arrived from the Soudan, a distance by camel perhaps of forty days' journey. Two swarthy-looking men were in charge of them. The timid little creatures, unable to speak Arabic, were pushed on by their captors from a horribly dark and noisome dungeon into which they had been thrust the night before. Then separately or two by two they were paraded up and down before the public gaze, being stopped now and then by some one of the spectators and examined, exactly as the horse dealer would examine the points of a horse before buying the animal at any of the public horse-marts. The sight was sickening. Some of the girls were terrified, others were silent and sad. Every movement was watched by the captives, anxious to know their present fate. My own face burned with anger as I stood helplessly by and saw them sold into slavery.

Our hearts have ached as we have read from time to time, from the lips of exiles, of the indescribable horrors of the journey across desert plains, cramped with pain, parched with thirst, and suffocated by the simoom; their food a handful of maize. Again, we have sickened at the sight of mutilated corpses, left by the wayside to the vulture and the burning rays of the African sun, and we have prayed, to the God of justice to stop these cruel practices.

In the name of our common humanity we pray that this ought to cease. The cry of these murdered ones goes up for redress from the desert track, across the Atlas heights, to the very gates of cities and towns within hail of Europe."

Booklet Handsomely Illustrating Ten other Premiums sent on request.

After trial you—the consumer—pay the usual retail value of the Soaps only. All middlemen's profits accrue to you in a valuable premium. The manufacturer alone adds Value; every middleman adds Cost. The Larkin plan saves you half the cost—saves you half the regular retail prices. Thousands of readers of this paper know these facts.

Many people prefer to send cash with order—it is not asked—but if you remit in advance you will receive in addition to all extras named a nice present to the lady of the house, and shipment day after order is received. Your money will be refunded without argument or comment if the Box or Desk does not prove all expected. We guarantee the safe delivery of all goods.

Write your order like this TO-DAY, while you think of it, or cut this out and sign it:

"You may ship me, subject to thirty days' trial, One Combination Box of 'Sweet Home' Soap, with extras, etc., and the Chautauqua Desk, upon your own conditions, viz:

If after thirty days' trial I find all the Soaps, etc., of unexcelled quality and the Desk entirely satisfactory to me and as represented, I will remit you $10.00; if not, I will notify you goods are subject to your order and you must remove them, making no charge for what I have used."

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON

QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

÷ MODENE ÷

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR PAIN TO THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident—In Compounding an incomplete mixture was accidentally applied on the back of the hand and on washing afterward found that the hair was completely removed. We pronounced the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure free from all injurious substances, and as simple any one can use it. It acts quickly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has not an equal whatever to anything ever used for a like purpose and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently. The heavy growth on the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although a slight will be removed after each application without injury or inconvenience during or after application. MODENE SUPERSEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits—used by persons of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate pattern styles of beard, will find a process in Modene which does away with shaving. Instructions and testimonials accompany each package thereby rendering its future use to no other necessary, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail, in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. ☞Correspondence secretly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) DR. HUNTER'S LECTURES

How the Lungs are Now Treated with Great Success.

No. 4.

Consumption, Bronchitis, Pulmonary Catarrh, Asthma, and Pneumonia are the chief diseases of the lungs which endanger our lives.

For a long time they were supposed to be constitutional diseases, and were treated through the stomach and general system. It was a false theory and fatal treatment. There were no cures of consumption under it.

We now know that they are not constitutional but local diseases of the lungs. They begin chiefly from colds, which inflame the lining of the air tubes and cells of the lungs. and fill them with unhealthy mucous. When the lungs are clogged they cannot perform their office, the breathing becomes short, fever arises, the patient is constantly racked by cough in efforts to clear the lungs, and the flesh and strength consume away.

These effects result from every attack of congestion of the lungs, whatever its cause. They can be remedied only by removing the congestion and freeing the lungs from the matter which obstructs them.

The only treatment that is effective and certain is the direct application of healing remedies to the lungs by inhalation. It is an axiom of medical science that all local diseases require local treatment for their cure. Physicians who regard lung diseases as constitutional, and treat them through the stomach, do not expect to cure them. Temporary relief of the symptoms is all they look for, or ever accomplish.

Not only must the lungs be treated by inhalation (which is the only way they can be reached at all), but the remedies inhaled must be adapted to the patient's strength and condition. Inhalation, of itself, is no remedy. It is only the means of applying remedies to the lungs. You may inhale what is of no benefit, or what will do you harm instead of good. The different kinds and stages of lung disease require different remedies. To know what to inhale in each case needs long experience in the application of this special treatment and profound knowledge of the conditions to be met.

The importance of the lungs, in the economy of life, is seen in the fact that to cease to breathe for only five minutes is fatal. Every function is suspended by it, and a paralysis of death seizes upon the body.

You can then understand why an organ so necessary to life cannot be impaired in its functions,even to a small extent, without injury to health resulting. The mildest catarrh of the lungs obstructs the freedom of breathing and deranges the action of every bodily function.

What, then, is this lung function which is so vital? What does breathing do? It purifies the old blood and makes new blood out of the food we eat. If the purification does not take place the whole system is paralyzed and we die. If it takes place imperfectly, we are weakened and diseased by the impurity that remains, and can have no health until it is remedied.

In commencing the inhalation treatment I gave to the world the first common sense application of medical science ever made to the cure of lung disease. I have cured by it, and am now treating with success every form of lung complaint. In over forty years' experience as a physician I have never, either in hospital or private practice, known of the cure of a consumptive by any other means.

Dyspepsia and Nervous Debility.
SPRING HILL, CONN., Jan. 15, 1894.
The Electropoise we bought from you has done all you claim for it, and I have every confidence in its curative powers.
I had suffered a good deal from a dyspeptic stomach and general nervous debility, and after one course of treatment all signs of these things are gone, and I am feeling as well as I ever did in my life.
LEONARD SMITH.
Pastor Baptist Church.

GRATIFYING RESULTS.
GREENCASTLE, PA., June 23, 1894.
I have found the Electropoise valuable in these ways: 1. As a tonic and restorative after a severe Sunday's work in the pulpit, it thus overleaping "blue Monday" entirely. 2. In soothing to sleep after great nervousness produced by a surgical operation without the use of an anæsthetic. 3. In threatened croup. Twice I used it to check this dreaded disease. An hour in each instance sufficed to turn the hard, hoarse cough to a free, loose one, as in an ordinary cold. 4. Where no specific ailment was apparent, but a debilitated condition, I have used it with the entire family with gratifying results.
REV. L. CARMON BELL, (Presbyterian Minister).

Electropoise TRADE MARK.

Burning the Candle at Both Ends.

Is the common experience these days. Of course this means exhausted vitality and disease.

But Electropoise will overcome the strain and will prevent its consuming vital tissue. Electropoise is not a battery, is harmless, is efficient, and is almost universally serviceable simply because it reinforces vitality and so permits nature to conquer disease. "Understand it?" No, of conrse you don't. But that's no argument against trying it.

Read this testimony to its value, and address for further particulars.

WORDS WITH YOUNG WOMEN.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., in response to a Letter received from Six Young Ladies of Ohio.*

HRIST, who took his text from a flock of birds flying overhead, saying, "Behold the fowls of the air," and from the flowers in the valley, saying, "Consider the lilies of the field," and from the clucking of a barn-yard fowl, saying, "As a hen gathereth her chickens under her wing," and from a crystal of salt picked up by the road-side, saying, "Salt is good," will grant us a blessing if, instead of taking a text from the Bible, I take for my text this letter from Cincinnati, which is only one of many letters which I have received from young women in New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, London, Edinboro, and from the ends of the earth, all implying that having some months ago preached the sermon on "Advice to Young Men," I could not, without neglect of duty, refuse to preach a sermon on "Advice to Young Women."

It is the more important that the pulpit be heard on this subject at this time when we are having such an illimitable discussion about what is called the "New Woman," as though some new creature of God had arrived on earth, or were about to arrive. One theory is that she will be an athlete, and boxing-glove and foot-ball and pugilistic encounter will characterize her. Another theory is that she will superintend ballot-boxes, sit in congressional hall, and through improved politics bring the millennium by the evil she will extirpate and the good she will install. Another theory is that she will adopt masculine attire and make sacred a vulgarianism positively horrific. Another theory is that she will be so esthetic that broom-handle and rolling-pin and coal-scuttle will be pictorialized with tints from soft skies or suggestions of Rembrandt and Raphael.

Heaven deliver the church and the world from any one of these styles of new woman! She will never come. I have so much faith in the evangelistic triumph and in the progress of all things in the right direction, that I prophesy that style of new woman will never arrive. She would hand over this world to diabolism, and from being, as she is now, the mightiest agency for the world's uplifting, she would be the mightiest force for its downthrust.

I will tell you who the new woman will be. It will be the good woman of all the ages past. Here and there a difference of attire, as the temporary custom may command, but the same good, honest, lovely, Christian, all-influential being that your mother and mine was. Of that kind of woman was Christian Eddy who, talking to a man who was so much of an unbeliever he had named his two children Voltaire and Tom Paine, nevertheless saw him converted, he breaking down with emotion as he said to her, "I cannot stand you, you talk like my mother," and telling the story of his conversion to twelve companions who had been blatant opposers of religion, they asked her to come and see them also, and tell them of Christ, and four of them were converted, and all the others greatly changed, and the leader of the band departing for heaven, shouted, "Joyful! Joyful! Joyful!" If you know any better style of woman than that, where is she? The world cannot improve on that kind. The new woman may have more knowledge, because she will have more books, but she will have no more common sense than that which tried to manage and discipline and educate us, and did as well as she could with such unpromising material. She may have more health than the woman of other days, for the sewing-machine and the sanitary regulations and added intelligence on the subjects of diet, ventilation, and exercise, and rescue from many forms of drudgery may allow her more longevity, but she will have the same characteristics which God gave her in paradise, with the exception of the nervous shock and moral jolt of the fall she got that day when not noticing where she stepped, she looked up into the branches of the fruit tree.

But I must be specific. This letter before me wants advice to young women.

Advice the first: Get your soul right with God and you will be in the best attitude for everything that comes. New ways of voyaging by sea, new ways of traveling by land, new ways of threshing the harvests, new ways of printing books, and the Patent Office is enough to enchant a man who has mechanical ingenuity and knows a good deal of levers and wheels, and we hardly do anything as it used to be done; invention after invention, invention on top of invention. But in the matter of getting right with God there has not been an invention for six thousand years. It is on the same line of repentance that David exercised about his sins, and the same old style of prayer that the publican used when he emphasized it by an inward stroke of both hands, and the same faith in Christ that Paul suggested to the jailer the night the penitentiary broke down. Aye, that is the reason I have more confidence in it. It has been tried by more millions than I dare to state lest I come far short of the brilliant facts. All who through Christ earnestly tried to get right with God, are right, and always will be right. That gives the young woman who gets that position superiority over all rivalries, all jealousies, all misfortunes, all health failings, all social disasters, and all the combined troubles of eighty years, if she shall live to be an octogenarian. If the world fails to appreciate her she says "God loves me, the angels in heaven are in sympathy with me, and I can afford to be patient until the day when the imperial chariot shall wheel to my door to take me up to my coronation." If health goes, she says, "I can endure the present distress, for I am on the way to a climate the first breath of which will make me proof against even the slightest discomfort." If she be jostled with perturbations of social life she can say, "Well, when I begin my life among the thrones of heaven and the kings and queens unto God shall be my associates, it will not make much difference who on earth forgot me when the invitations to that reception were made out." All right with God you are all right with everything.

Martin Luther writing a letter of condolence to one of his friends who had lost his daughter, began by saying, "This is a hard world for girls." It is for those who are dependent upon their own wits and the whims of the world, and the preferences of human favor, but those who take the Eternal God for their portion not later than fifteen years of age, and that is ten years later than it ought to be, will find that while Martin Luther's letter of condolence was true in regard to many, if not most, with respect to those who have the wisdom, and promptitude, and the earnestness to get right with God, I declare that this is a good world for girls.

Advice the Second: Make it a matter of religion to take care of your physical health. I do not wonder that the Greeks deified health and hailed Hygeia as a goddess. I rejoice that there have been so many modes of maintaining and restoring young womanly health invented in our time. They may have been known a long time back, but they have been popularized in our day—lawn tennis, croquet, and golf, and the bicycle. It always seemed strange and inscrutable that our human race should be so slow of locomotion, when creatures of less importance have powers of velocity, wing of bird or foot of antelope, leaving us far behind, and while it seems so important that we be in many places in a short while, we were weighed down with incapacities, and most men if they run a mile are exhausted, or dead from the exhaustion. It was left until the last decade of the nineteenth century to give the speed which we see whirling through all our cities and along the country roads, and with that speed comes health. The women of the next decade will be healthier than at any time since the world was created, while the invalidism which has so often characterized womanhood will pass over to manhood, which by its posture on the wheel, is coming to curved spine and cramped chest and a deformity for which another fifty years will not have power to make rescue. Young man, sit up straight when you ride. Darwin says the human race is descended from the monkey, but the bicycle will turn an hundred thousand men of the present generation in physical condition from man to monkey. For good womanhood, I thank God that this mode of recreation has been invented. Use it wisely, modestly, Christianly. No good woman needs to be told what attire is proper and what behavior is right. If anything be doubtful reject it. A hoydenish, boisterous, masculine woman is the detestation of all, and every revolution of the wheel she rides is towards depreciation and downfall. Take care of your health, O, woman; of your nerves in not reading the trash which makes up ninety-nine out of one hundred novels, or by eating too many cornucopias of confectionery. Take care of your eyes by not reading at hours when you ought to be sleeping. Take care of your ears by stopping them against the tides of gossip that surge through every neighborhood.

Health! Only those know its value who have lost it. The earth is girdled with pain, and a vast proportion of it is the price paid for early recklessness. I close this thought with the salutation in Macbeth:

[illegible]

Advice the third: Appreciate your mother while you have her. It is the almost universal testimony of young women who have lost mother, that they did not realize what she was to them until after her exit from this life. Indeed, mother is in the appreciation of many a young lady a hindrance. The maternal inspection is often considered an obstacle. Mother has so many notions about that which is proper and that which is improper. It is astounding how much more many girls know at eighteen than their mothers at forty-fi With what an elaborate argument, p haps spiced with some temper, the you ling tries to reverse the opinion of the ling. The sprinkle of gray on the mat nal forehead is rather an indication to recent graduate of the female semin that the circumstances of to-day or night are not fully appreciated. Wha wise boarding-school that would be if mothers were the pupils and the dau ters the teachers. How well the te could chaperone the fifties. Then moth do not amount to much anyhow. T are in the way, and are always ask questions about postage marks of lett and asking, "who is that Mary D.?" "where did you form that acquainta Flora?" and "where did you get t ring, Myra?" For mothers have such precedented means of knowing everyth —they say "it was a bird in the air" told them. Alas, for that bird in the Will not someone lift his gun and sh it? It would take whole libraries to the wisdom which the daughter kn s more than her mother. "Why cann have this?" "Why cannot I do tha And the question in many a group s been, although not plainly stated, "W shall we do with the mothers, anyh ? They are so far behind the times." Pe it me to suggest that if the mother had g n more time to looking after herself and time to looking after you, she would e been as fully up-to-date as you, in m c, in style of gait, in esthetic taste, and i ll sorts of information. I expect that w le you were studying botany, and chemi y, and embroidery, and the new opera e was studying household economics. ut one day from over-work, or sitting t of nights with a neighbor's sick child, a blast of the east wind, on which pne o nias are horsed, mother is sick. Ye he family think she will soon be well, fo he has been sick so often, and always ha ot well, and the physician comes three es a day, and there is a consultation o he doctors, and the news is gradually br en that recovery is impossible, given in he words "while there is life there is h ." And the white pillow over which re strewn the locks a little tinted with s w, becomes the point around which al he family gather, some standing, some k el-ing, and the pulse beats the last throb nd the bosom trembles with the last br th, and the question is asked in a whisp by all the group, "Is she gone?" And i is over.

Now come the regrets. Now the d. gh-ter reviews her former criticism of n er-nal supervision. For the first time s realizes what it is to have a mothe nd what it is to lose a mother. Tell me en and women, young and old, did any us appreciate how much mother was us until she was gone? Young woman ou will probably never have a more dis er-ested friend than your mother. Whe she says anything is unsafe or impruden ou had better believe it is unsafe or i rud-dent. When she declares it is some ing you ought to do, I think you had bet do it. She has seen more of the world an you have. Do you think she could ve any mercenary or contemptible mot in what she advises you? She would ive her life for you if it were called for. Do you know of anyone else who wou do more than that for you? Do you now of anyone who would do as much? ai and again she has already endangered hat life during six weeks of diphthe or scarlet fever, and she never once br ght up the question of whether she had tter stay, breathing day and night the ta-gion. The grave-yards are full of m ers who died taking care of their chi en. Better appreciate your mother before out appreciation of her will be no kin to her, and the post-mortem regrets w be more and more of an agony as the pass on. Big head-stones of polished per-deen, and the best epitaphs which th am-ily put together could compose, and nd of whitest roses from the conservatory e often the attempt to atone for the anks we ought to have uttered in living rs, and the kind words that would have ne more good than all the Calla lilies er piled up on the silent mounds of the meteries. The world makes applauditory lo over the work of mothers who have ised boys to be great men and I could rn to my book-shelves and find the mes of fifty distinguished men who had eat mothers; Cuvier's mother, Walter ott's mother, St. Bernard's mother, Benmin West's mother. But who praises others for what they do for daughters ho make the homes of America? I do t know of an instance of such recognion. I declare to you that I believe I am tering the first word that has ever been tered in appreciation of the self-denial, the fatigues, and good sense and prays which those mothers go through who ivigate a family of girls from the edge of e cradle to the school-house door, and m the school-house door up to the marge altar. That is an achievement which e eternal God celebrates high up in the avens, though for it human hands so ldom clap the faintest applause. My! y! what a time that mother had with ose youngsters, and if she had relaxed re and work and advice and solicitation heavenly help, that next generation ould have landed in the poor-house, idiot ylum or penitentiary. It is while she is ing, but never while she is dead that me girls call their mother "maternal anstor" or "the old woman."

Advice the fourth: Allow no time to ss without brightening someone's life. ithin five minutes walk of you there is me one in a tragedy compared with hich Shakespeare's King Lear or Victor ugo's Jean Valjean has no power. Go it and brighten somebody's life with a eering word, or smile, or a flower. Take good book and read a chapter to that ind man. Go up that dark alley and ake that invalid woman laugh with some od story. Go to that house from which at child has been taken by death and ll the father and mother what an escape e child has had from the winter of earth to the springtime of heaven. For God's ke makes someone happy for ten minces if for no longer a time. A young woan bound on such a misssion, what might e not accomplish. Oh, there are thouands of these manufacturers of sunshine. hey are "King's Daughters" whether indeor outside that delightful organization. hey do more good before they are twenty ears of age than selfish women who live nety, and they are so happy just because ey make others happy. Compare such young woman who feels she has such a ission with one who lives a round of anities, card-case in hand calling on peole for whom she does not care, except for me social advantage, and insufferably ored when the call is returned, and tryg to look young after they are old, and ving a life of insincerity and hollowness, nd dramatization and sham. Young woan! live to make others happy and you ill be happy. Live for yourself and you ill be miserable. There never has been n exception to the rule: there never will e an exception.

I have noticed on many of the railroads at the porter will go around and light e lamps while it is broad daylight and I m at first surprised, but I afterwards find at we are about to enter a tunnel and its arkness is thus illuminated. Oh, kindle light for those who are plunging into nancial or domestic or spiritual midnight.

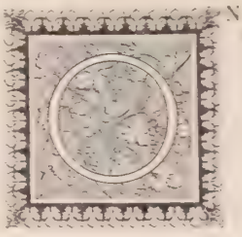
Advice the fifth: Plan out your life on big scale, whether you are a farmer's aughter, or a shepherdess among the hills, r the flattered pet of a drawing-room filled ith statuary, and pictures, and bric-a-rac. Stop where you are and make a lan for your life-time. You cannot be tisfied with a life of frivolity, and giggle, nd indirection. Trust the world and it ill cheat you if it does not destroy you. "The Pedubtable" was the name of an enemy's ship that Lord Nelson spared twice from demolition, but that same ship afterward sent the ball that killed him, and the world on which you smile may aim at you its deadliest weapon. Be a God's woman. This moment make as mighty a change as did a college student of England. He had neglected his studies, rioting at night with dissipated companions, and sleeping in the class-room when he ought to have been listening. A fellow-student came into his room one morning, before the young man I am speaking of had arisen from his pillow, and said to him, "Paley, you are a fool! You are wasting your opportunities. Do not throw away your life." Paley said, "I was so struck with what he said that I lay in bed until I had formed my plan for life. I ordered my fire to be always laid over night. I arose at five and read steadily all day. Allotted to each portion of the day its proper branch of study and became the senior wrangler." What an hour that was when a resolution definitely placed changed a young man from a reckless and time-wasting student to a consecrated man who stopped not until all time and all eternity shall be debtor to his pen and influence.

Young women! draw out, and decide what you will be, and do, God helping. Write it out in a plain hand, not like the letters which Josephine received from Napoleon in Italy, the writing so scrawling and scattered that it was sometimes taken as a map of the seat of war. Put the plan on the wall of your room, or write it in the opening of a blank book, or put it where you will be compelled often to see it. A thousand questions of your coming life you cannot settle now, but there is one question you can settle independent of man, woman, angel, and devil, and that is that you will be a God's woman now, henceforth and forever. Clasp hands with the Almighty. Pythagoras represented life by the letter Y, because it early divides into two ways. Look out for opportunities of cheering, inspiring, rescuing, and saving all the people you can. Make a league with the Eternities. I seek your present and everlasting safety. David Brewster said that a comet belonging to our system called Lexell's comet is lost, as it ought to have appeared thirteen times, and has not appeared at all. Alas! it is not only the lost comets, but the lost stars, and what were considered fixed stars. Some of the most brilliant and steady souls have disappeared. The world wonders at the charge of the Light Brigade, immortalized by Tennyson. Only a few of the six hundred got back from the charge under Lord Cardigan, of the Muscovite guns, and all the havoc was done in twenty-five minutes. The charge beginning at ten minutes past eleven o'clock, and closing at thirty-five minutes past eleven, and yet nothing left on the field but dying and dead men, dying and dead horses. But a smaller proportion of the men and women who go into the battle of life come out unwounded. The slaughter has been and will be terrific, and we all need God, and we need him now, and we need him all the time. And let me say there is a new woman, as there is a new man, and that is the regenerated woman made such by the ransacking transforming, upbuilding, triumphant power of the Spirit who is so superior to all other spirits that he has been called for ages the Holy Spirit. Quicker than wheel ever turned on its axis; quicker than fleetest hoof ever struck the pavement; quicker than zig-zag lightning ever dropped down the sky, the ransoming power I speak of will revolutionize your entire nature. Then you can start out on a voyage of life, defying both calm and cyclone, saying with Dean Alford:

One who has known in storms to sail
I [illegible]
Above the roaring of the gale
I [illegible]
He holds me when the billows smile:
I shall not fall:
If short [illegible]
He tempers all.

Palestine Cotton-Carders.

Another Famous Colored Picture, Representing a Phase of Oriental Life.



N the first page of this issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presents the third of its popular series of illustrations by its new color process. It deals with a subject that is exceedingly simple, yet picturesque, and full of delicate, artistic feeling that fascinates the eye, while it charms the sense. It is only a group of Jerusalem workmen; yet it is not to be forgotten that Christ himself was the Son of a humble carpenter.

Jerusalem cannot, in the strict modern sense, be called a manufacturing or commercial city, yet there are many thriving industries conducted among its people. In ancient times, when the Holy City was indeed "the glory of the whole earth," the tradesmen of Jerusalem were at the very head of their different handicrafts. Goldsmiths and silversmiths plied their delicate arts in open booths or lightly enclosed shops; coppersmiths beat out trays, basins and pitchers of renowned patterns, asmorers fashioned swords and spear-heads for the nations round about; brass-founders and the makers of household and artistic implements; builders, the dealers in gems and all sorts of precious stones, the carvers of wood, ivory and ebony, and the stone-cutters, masons, carpenters, brick-makers, potters, tanners, tailors, bakers and tent-makers all combined to make the capital city of David and Solomon a bustling, active metropolis.

MRS. J. S. WILLIAMSON, MISSION-WORKER.

Not the least important of the industries that still remain to Jerusalem are those of the weaver and spinner. In the manufacture of cloth and fine linen, the East has never been excelled. The Bible tells us that in the days of Amos, rich men lay on couches of damask. The Tyrian bride of the King of Israel had garments that were inwrought with threads of gold. Curtains and tapestries were inwoven with rich figured and floral designs.

The beautiful colored picture on the first page of this issue shows a group of cotton-carders at work in the court of a building in Jerusalem. The cotton-carders are chiefly Jews who, if not in possession of a small store or workshop, go about from house to house, where they get more or less to do. Their usual charge is from ten to fifteen cents for six pounds of cotton, the employers also supplying the worker with food meanwhile. The latter is usually very plain, consisting of bread and a dish of olives. These carders are usually skilled upholsterers. When called to the villages round about, where money is scarce, they are paid in chickens, eggs, dried figs or raisins. Each carder has an overdress made of cotton, long and wide enough to wrap the whole body, which, with light undergarments, a fez and shoes, constitutes the entire costume.

Cotton (the name of which is derived from the Arabic word Kutun), has been a staple, domestic and commercial manufacfacture from the earliest ages, and is produced in abundance, and employed for clothing in Palestine and Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Egypt, India, Italy, Spain, and some parts of the Western Hemisphere. Pliny, the historian, asserts that the priests of Egypt preferred cotton to linen for their garments worn in the worship of the temples, and the fact that cotton robes were so worn is mentioned on the famous Rosetta stone. The Jewish ephod as well as other portraits of the priestly attire was doubtless occasionally made of this fabric, but linen was usually worn.

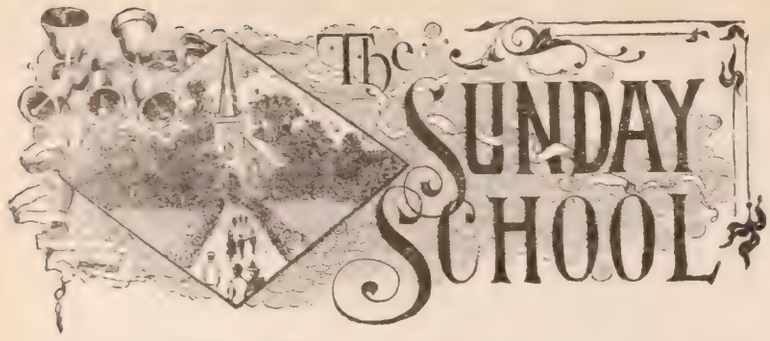
Cotton is now both grown and manufactured in various parts of Syria and Palestine, and as it is cooler for wearing purposes than linen, is very generally preferred for turbans and undergarments. There is little doubt that the fabric was widely known in Palestine in New Testament times although, for many purposes, linen was used on account of its finer texture and superior appearance.

The cotton plant of the Orient has dark-green leaves, bears beautiful red-purple blossoms, and produces a silky floss, long, strong, and white, and adapted for spinning. In Palestine, the implements used (as shown in the illustration), are of the most primitive character, and can be applied equally to cotton or wool. An instrument for carding costs very little and can be used for years. It is a piece of wood in the form of a bow, to which a string is attached, which is beaten by a mallet till the quantity of cotton or wool is carded. The carders are called in Palestine "Faddafeen," and their instrument "Kos." During the cold weather they stay in town and in summer travel about in search of work among the peasants and farmers, carding any cotton or wool that may be needed for the use of families.

Her Work Greatly Blessed.

Mrs. Josephine S. Williamson's Labors for Christ Among Fallen Girls in the Slums of New York City.

AT different times in the past, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has had occasion to refer to the excellent work conducted by Mrs. Josephine S. Williamson among "unfortunate" girls in the lower part of the city of New York. Mrs. Williamson has labored in the slums and the notorious dives and opium joints in Doyer and Pell streets, and other places of like character, nearly twenty-one years. She has been instrumental in the rescue of many fallen women who frequent such places. She was the founder of the Bethany Home, one of the most successful institutions for cases of this character. Lately, having again felt called to undertake new service in soul-winning, she has established a Mission and Rest at No. 125 West Third street, New York, for the purpose of giving spiritual and bodily assistance to the miserable, homeless castaways, in a neglected section of the city. The new Mission was opened July 6, since which nearly fifty erring ones have been led to the Saviour. In one instance, a noted dive-keeper has been converted, and is now striving to bring her lost sisters into the light. The Mission has also been greatly blessed otherwise. Mrs. Williamson is now endeavoring to secure means for the establishment of a house for the reception of the outcasts, and a friend of the work has paid the rent in advance. The Rest will then be a temporary place for those who are anxious to be reclaimed and who point towards a better life. One poor girl who, after leading a life of wickedness in New York, was at last converted, gave this interesting account of her experience: "On the 6th of January last I was wandering in the snow, without either a home or habitation, and not knowing where to go, I went into the Mission. I was spoken to by Mrs. Williamson, who accompanied me to a Christian home, in that dreadful weather, having first prayed with me, and urged me to put my trust in Jesus. I cannot think of the snow without feeling thankful to God, for by the [illegible]



DAVID ANOINTED KING.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 1. I. Sam. 16 :1-13. Golden Text I. Sam. 16: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SAMUEL mourned for Saul; and the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel. And the Lord said unto Samuel, "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from being king over Israel?" It was God's first and last rebuke to Samuel. Most men would admire Samuel's magnanimity in mourning for the man who had superseded him in the government of Israel, and would laud such unusual disinterestedness. And yet in God's eyes this was not pure; there was something personal in it, and the Lord's prophets must be above what is personal. At a great and very real sacrifice to himself, Samuel had obeyed his God in anointing Saul, and had resigned his own office of judge with meekness and dignity. And, moreover, he had done all in his power to help Saul, and to fit him for his place in the kingdom. As far as Saul did know God when he gave him another heart, Samuel had been and now the old man's heart was wellnigh broken that all God's favor to Saul, and all his own personal interest in him and prayer for him should be in vain. He could not quite relinquish his hold on Saul, or give up hope that even yet things might change, and the one for whom so much had been done might turn out well. Oh, how many a worker with souls has come to this point! Not only has the terrible reality of a lost soul dawned upon them, but also they have been unable to understand how so much of the grace of God, so many prayers which seemed to them to have been inspired by the Holy Spirit; so many promises on which they have relied, have seemed to be contradicted by facts, and Satan has sought to demoralize them by the woful suggestion that, after all, God can be untrue, or on the other hand, that some lack of faith or consecration on their part has ruined an immortal soul; and the thought almost drives them mad. There is one only sure way out of this net; it is the clue to every tangle; and David, the Psalmist, found it so: "Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord—looking off unto Jesus—for he shall pluck my feet out of the net" (Ps. 25: 15).

The world does not hesitate to judge God by circumstances, and to allow circumstances to control their moral being. The man of faith lives above things that are seen and temporal; he lives in another region; he sees things from above, where the eternal God carries out his vast plans and orders according to his eternal unalterable purposes. Therefore he looks on all which happens, through the telescope of faith: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" What he cannot understand, until such time as God is pleased to give him light upon it: but he believes in a love and wisdom which is far above and far beyond the measure of the finite; instead of doubting or criticizing his God, he bows down and adores. When a prophet of the Lord fails to side with him because he cannot understand him, his power begins to forsake him. "How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from being king over Israel? Fill thine horn with oil, and go; I will send thee to Jesse the Bethlehemite, for I have provided me a king among his sons." Poor Samuel! For the first time in his life he yields to the fear of man: he says, "How can I go! If Saul hear it he will kill me." When we live before man we fear man; when we live in the presence of God, we fear no man. If we live only to do the will of God, we prove continually, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me," (Phil. 4: 13), the Lord will and does provide, and how can I?" is hushed in our hearts by the presence of the Almighty. It was the only time of weakness which is recorded in the life of Samuel, and it has its precious lessons for us all.

He Learns to Leave

God came down to the level of his tried servant and explained matters to him." How canst thou go? overcome through the blood of the sacrifice. Take an heifer with thee and say, I am come to sacrifice to the Lord! I send thee no warfare on thine own charges: go in the authority wherewith I send thee." The red heifer was the sacrifice whose ashes made the water of separation to cleanse one who had touched the dead (Num. 19): it was also the heifer which must be beheaded when a murder was discovered, the guilty party could not be found, the elders of the city next to the slain man must wash their hands over the beheaded heifer and declare their innocence. (Deut. 21: 1-9.) There may have been a special meaning for Samuel in the fact that the sacrifice should be a heifer; he had spiritually touched the dead in his consideration of himself and of Saul. Now God aroused him to act as a prophet, and would take the responsibility: "Call Jesse to the sacrifice, and what thou shalt do: and thou shalt anoint unto me him whom I name unto thee." Samuel was at large again, he "did that which the Lord spake;" the path of obedience is the path of blessing, and now, sent of God, and no more friction in his spirit, everything which had seemed impossible was easy. He came to Bethlehem. and the elders of the town trembled at his coming, they did not know what it might portend. It was not now Samuel that feared; others feared him. "Comest thou peaceably?" they ask. "Peaceably," he answered; "I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord. Sanctify yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice. And he sanctified Jesse and his sons and called them to the sacrifice." O how little did those sons of Jesse know what was about to happen! All the constraint between Samuel and his God had vanished; now the prophet was ready for any word from the Lord: the sacrifice was slain, the blood was shed, the past was cleansed, the prophet was free.

The elders of the city and the family of Jesse were still in expectation of what was coming about when Samuel desired Jesse to make his sons pass before him. Samuel, still in some measure under the impression of the great stature and physical force of Saul, was struck with the proportions of the eldest son of Jesse, and said: "Surely the Lord's anointed is before us." Whether those words were spoken only in the secret of his heart, or whether this intercourse with God was audible before the company of Bethlehemites, does not appear. But the Lord said in a way that Samuel understood: "Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him; for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart. How easily a captious spirit might have said, "Why, then, did God choose Saul?" Here is the answer: God says through Hosea (13: 10,11): "Thou saidst, give me a king and princes. I gave thee a king in mine anger and took him away in my wrath." In God's anger he gave his people a king after their own heart. Now in mercy he was about to give them a king after his own heart.

Seven of Jesse's sons passed before Samuel, but he said, "The Lord hath not chosen these. . . . Are here all thy children?" "There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold he keepeth the sheep." "Send and fetch him," said the prophet, "for we will not sit down till he be come hither." The young shepherd, who knew the Lord as his Shepherd, was brought, and the voice of the Lord sounded in the soul of the prophet: "Arise, anoint him, for this is he." No question with Samuel now as to what might be the consequences to him of this action; he was one with his God again, and in the midst of his brethren and the elders, David was anointed king. And God set his seal upon him, "the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward."

"HE SENT AND BROUGHT HIM IN."

AFTER Saul had proved himself unfit to be God's vicegerent over Israel, and had been definitely rejected, Samuel seems to have sunk into a condition of melancholy. Patriotic statesmen in modern times have often became so depressed. With a clearer knowledge than the general public can have of the condition of the nation, they are distressed when, themselves superseded, they see their successors taking a new line of policy. They think their beloved country is on the way to ruin. But God has ways of saving a nation that his servants do not dream of, and it is a consoling reflection that may be useful to people in business, or in public life, that God, who is all-wise, has the future in his keeping. Having done our whole duty, having made every effort in our power to avert the evil, we should not fret over failure, or become despairing, but put our trust in God, who is able to deliver. Samuel is aroused from idle sorrow and goes to Bethlehem, where Boaz and Ruth used to live. Their grandson, Jesse, occupies their estate and is apparently a man of some importance in the region, probably a sheik. In his younger days, Samuel had been accustomed to pay visits to various parts of the land, as judge or as priest, to denounce wickedness, punish wrong-doers, and set wrong things right. But he was now eighty years old, and for some twenty or thirty years had been in retirement. News of his arrival naturally disturbed the people. It probably led to some self-examination. Had they done anything wrong? Was this good man coming to reprove them? It is an ominous thing when a man or a child dreads the appearance of a man renowned for his holiness. But the apprehension in this case was needless. Samuel had come to offer a sacrifice. The old man goes through the duty, and then, according to the rules of Oriental hospitality, is entertained by Jesse, as the chief resident of the village.

It is in this household that the real business which has taken him to Bethlehem is to be done. In some mysterious way he had learned that one of Jesse's sons was to succeed Saul on the throne. Saul might live a long time yet and Samuel might be dead before the new king would be called to the throne. But the king in embryo is not to miss the holy anointing, typical of the spirit of the Lord, which the aged prophet was authorized to perform. He asks to see Jesse's sons, and the father presents them in the order of their birth. There were seven of them and two older sisters, Zeruiah and Abigail. The eldest son, apparently a fine young man, of kingly bearing, won Samuel's admiration. Samuel thought this was the future king. His experience with the stalwart Saul, wh was head and shoulders above other mer had not taught the prophet that kingl qualities must be looked for not in th body but in the mind. The true kin was not among the seven, and Samue was puzzled. Were there no more? Wa this all the family? Well, there was or other, a mere boy, out on the farm mind ing the sheep. Apparently Jesse thoug him of so slight importance that he ha not presented him with the others. Fathe often make the mistake of overlooking th fine qualities in some one of their boy David is hastily summoned and was once identified as the future king.

How long wilt thou mourn? Samuel ha as we say, lost heart. The best men a liable to despair when a great calamity o curs, or the prospect looks dark. WOMAN'S WORK IN COREA.

Irs. Rosetta S. Hall, Medical Missionary, Writes of the Royal Household and the Murdered Queen—The Woman's Hospital and its Staff—Corean Brides and Weddings.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN COREAN BRIDE AND GROOM.

O long ago as when King David reigned in Israel, the Soul, or Capital, of Corea was at Ping Yang. From 960 to 1392 it was at Song Do, about a day's journey north of the present capital. Some five hundred years ago Tai Cho, the founder of the present dynasty, decided to remove his capitol from Song Do. At first he selected a magnificent mountain site in the province of Chung Chyang—perhaps 120 miles south of the present Soul. After three days' work there, he was warned in a dream to go elsewhere. Tradition tells us, though, that this is to be the site of the Soul of the next dynasty, which was prophesied to begin when the present dynasty was 500 years old. In Corea the word "Tai," pronounced ta, means "great," thus China is known as "Tai Tsuk," or the Great Country. The Great South Gate is called the Nam (south) Tai Moon (gate.) Tai Chow as "The Great Cho," was next directed to the city of Han Yang, and by 1395, the Soul of to-day had been enclosed with a wall forty feet high, extending over the adjacent hills and valleys. This great wall is said to have been constructed by 198,000 men in nine months. In this wall there are seven gates—the one through which I first entered the city is known as the New West Gate. We consider things made one hundred years ago old, but in Corea this gate, made over three hundred years ago, is called new. The wall is yet in fairly good repair, though large portions of it are five hundred years old.

After the war closed in Corea last year, both the King and Queen seemed more friendly to missionaries than before. When the annual meeting of the Methodist Mission closed, the King requested to see Bishop Ninde, and during the interview thanked him for the teachers sent to Corea, and urged him upon his arrival in America to send more. There was great rejoicing among the native Christians when they heard of the Bishop's visit to the palace, and they prayed with renewed diligence for the conversion of their majesties. From my conversations mostly with women of the middle class, it was my impression up to last winter that her subjects had no great love for her Majesty. She belongs to the Min family which is non-progressive, and unswerving in loyalty to China. However, as the Corean people have been brought up for so many generations to love and respect China, that can scarcely be credited as the reason, but it is rather due to certain dark deeds that they have attributed to her, such as trying to poison the Tai-won-Kun, who strangely enough seemed to have the respect and confidence of his people in spite of his bigotism and his bloody reign during his son's minority. Also it used to be whispered that a bright and favorite son of one of the King's concubines had come to an untimely end through similar means. The Queen's own son, newspaper articles to the contrary, is, to put it in gentle terms, "feeble-minded," that is what is said of him in Corea, and I have seen the young man, and his appearance certainly warrants it. It is but natural that his mother should be jealous of him. However, since the late war, her Majesty has had frequent interviews with Mrs. Dr. Underwood, a Presbyterian missionary, and she apparently became much interested in the outside world. Among other things, Mrs. Underwood told her about Christmas trees, and when the Corean New Year came, Jan. 26, 1895, the Queen asked Mrs. Underwood to trim a tree for her at the Palace.

Her Majesty also had audience with Mrs. M. F. Scranton, who was the first to ever open a school for Corean girls. Mrs. Scranton took her little grandchildren with her, and they received a great deal of attention from the Queen. So in one way or another, her Christian subjects, at least, had begun to love their Queen more of late, and to feel that there was hope of her speedy conversion, and no doubt will feel badly over her untimely death, if those terrible telegrams that we have been reading of late, be true.

THE WOMAN'S HOSPITAL OF THE W. F. M. S., COREA.

From a Photograph forwarded by Mrs. Roseita Sherwood Hall.

Our Mission Hospital and Dispensary are only Corean houses modeled over a little, but they look nice and answer the purpose very well. There is a nice large drug-room, with store room, and room for washing and cleaning up bottles, etc. There is a good-sized waiting room, and a consulting room between it and the drug-room. There is a fine large front room, well lighted, that can be used as an operating room, and there are five rooms for in-patients—we call them "wards," but they are hardly large enough to be dignified by that name, though each will accommodate several patients comfortably. They are warmed by "kultuks," and the patients rest upon the warmed floors rolled up in blanket in Corean style—we have added sheets to the outfit, and that is about all. It makes it a little hard for the doctor, till one gets used to it, to have to get down upon the floor to take a patient's pulse or respiration, dress wounds, etc., but upon the whole I believe it is the best thing. In the first place, it is Corean; they think our beds must be very cold, and I see no reason for trying to change customs that do no harm. As their floors are warmed, they are really comfortable places to sleep. Second, there is no danger of your patient getting out of bed when you don't want her to. Third, it is a clean bed, with room, and is easily disinfected. And last, but perhaps not least in a mission hospital, it is economical.

The lady in gray in the photograph is Dr. Meta Howard, who began medical work here in 1887, but had to return home two years later on account of ill health. Our hospital helper stands to the right in a white Korean dress; she is matron and all the nurse we have. We call her Pungsun Amani, which means Pungsun's mother, Corean women having no names of their own. The other woman is the hospital cook. Our "kuisyu" (soldier) stands in the foreground, dressed in the costume of a Corean soldier. He is our right-hand man, does most of our Corean marketing, shopping, money exchanging, etc. He seems quite trustworthy, and we would not know how to get along without him. The Kuisyu (kesu) and Pungsun Amani are both Christians, and are earnest workers in the Lord's vineyard. Pungsun Amani reads the Bible in Corean to the hospital patients and talks and prays with them. She is faithful in her attendance upon the religious services in our Woman's Church that we have recently organized here, and brings those patients who are able to come with her.

Corean women are not pretty as a rule, though I have seen some exceptions. I know, however, of one a little better looking perhaps than the average. She is well dressed, her yoke and sleeves are made of some bright colored silk, probably purple, and the long outside skirt of perhaps a light green in this case; though it is more often a bright red. Corean women usually dress in bright colors, unless in mourning when they wear white. A Corean girl parts her hair in the middle and wears it in a long braid down her back until her wedding-day, when it is put up in a low coil at the nape of the neck, fastened with a wooden, coral or silver bar pin. They do not wear earrings—in fact to all appearances the dress of a Corean woman is very sensible, but in truth, so many skirts fastened by bands, which though broad have to be bound so tightly about chest and waist to keep them from slipping down, make them not so hygenic as they look. If they could be sewed to the yokes they would do very well.

Corean women carry their children upon the back, much the same as the Japanese, or tie them to the back of an older sister, or to a "child-nurse." Quite little girls often bring sick children to me at the dispensary this way.

The most of our older girls are Christians and I think some of the little ones are, too. One of the older ones often gets a few of the little ones about her and has a little prayer-meeting, each offering simple child-like prayers, asking for just what they want. All are interesting girls, and though I don't have time, as yet, to see much of them except professionally when they are sick, yet I have grown to love them dearly. It only costs $45 a year to support one of these girls in our school. Some are supported by individuals, and some by auxiliaries of our W. F. M. S. in America, and some branches support four or five, and "Hung Syuni," our youngest. They write to them and inquire after them, sometimes sending them a box for Christmas which, of course, pleases the little ones very much.

Our two oldest girls are soon to be married—they have both received their wedding outfit from their affianced. This is according to Corean custom. I witnessed the ceremony that attends the reception of these things, and I will try and tell something of it. A servant comes bearing upon the head a large Corean box with bright brass hinges and a lock; this is received, wrapped up in red silk with green tassels, in the court by the mother of the girl, or in this case, in our hall, by Mrs. Scranton, and it is placed upon a big stone dish full of freshly-made Corean bread. Then the intended bride is brought out; according to custom she has to be almost dragged out by main force, and when she gets out does not look, but turns her back while the mother takes out one by one, the pieces of bright-colored silks for yokes and skirts, white silk for underwear, and cotton cloth, and three or four bundles of cotton, and the silver pin to fasten up her hair with on the wedding day, and a large silver ring, also an official-looking document written in Chinese, which answers for the marriage certificate. These things are admired, and then put back, without unfolding, and locked up for three days, and then they are cut and sewed and made up by the bride and friends.

COREAN CHILDREN.

A Corean girl never sees her husband until after she is married—all arrangments between them being made by the "go-between." Even after marriage she is not supposed to look at her husband or speak to him for three days, and the longer she remains in silence before him, the better it is considered. Our girls are to be married with the Christian ceremony; but Corean customs are otherwise quite closely observed. Nearly one year ago, Cecelia, one of our baptised Christian girls, was married to Mr. Kang, also a Christian, the Corean teacher of one of our missionaries, and a student and teacher in the Parent Board's School. It is the custom for the groom to be married in the "palace-going" robes and hat, which are usually hired for the occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Kang, I believe, start the first Corean home, in which both husband and wife were Christians before marriage. ROSETTA SHERWOOD HALL.

ARMENIA MAY YET BE SAVED.

The Civilized Nations Unite to Put an End to Turkey's Butchery of Inoffensive Christians — The Ottoman Power Tottering to its Fall—Relief Work Progressing.

UNLESS all signs fail, the infidel Turkish Power, condemned unanimously by verdict of the nations for its crimes against God and humanity, will soon be swept out of Europe and even its possessions in Asia Minor may be torn from its grasp and partitioned among the civilized races. The long and bloody persecution of Christians in Armenia and elsewhere, the countless massacres and inconceivable cruelties are now heaping cumulative judgment upon the Moslem. Sultan Abdul Hamid's vow to exterminate the Armenian people has recoiled upon himself and his Moslem subjects. The internal revolution now threatens to sweep away the Sultan and his Ministers; yet the fanatical ruler continues to defy all Europe and the better sense of his own people as well, by his present course. Positive proof that he approves of the recent butcheries and persecutions of Christians in Armenia is found in his decoration of the dismissed Vali of Van, Bahri Pasha, who was removed at England's demand and who has now been highly honored by the Sultan. This is only one of several similar instances in which the Sultan has shown his contempt for the opinion of Europe regarding his infamies in Armenia.

Lord Salisbury, the British Premier, at a recent public dinner, made an address which plainly intimated that the patience of Europe was exhausted, and that the Sultan's folly had sealed the doom of his own goverment, if not of the Ottoman empire. Austria, Italy, and Germany are believed to share this view, and may act in concert with England for the permanent protection of the Armenians. Lord Salisbury recognized in the present condition of Turkey, the result of its offences against God. He said:

[illegible] exempt any more than any other potentate from the law that injustice will bring the highest one on earth [illegible]

Concerning one of the most recent massacres, a gentleman, writing from Trebizond, October 9th, gives this description:

Like a clap of thunder in a clear sky, the thing [illegible] from near and distant points, the [illegible] fore, and the thud, thud, of sword [illegible] way and the work of looting began. [illegible] fathers in this cowardly and brutal [illegible] least effort to check them. Ap- [illegible] when [illegible] he was reached full on the ears. Some in suspense wait to hear the fate of their nearest and dearest, others rejoice at greeting them again. The rags till the schools that are under foreign protection, and the [illegible]. There is no telling how many have perished. Last autumn's [illegible] estimate—probably the figure would rise much higher, and how far the massacre will sweep through the villages remains to be seen.

This account, which is absolutely authentic, gives the most emphatic contradiction to the Turkish "official version" of the Trebizond riot, sent out through legations and otherwise. Another letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from a reliable source in the Turkish capital, directs attention to the great need of help in the Trebizond district, and says:

Trebizond is a field which will doubtless call for the expenditure of considerable in the way of benevolence, and being a field also to which your agent Mr. Howard can probably go with safety. When on the ground he may find ways for going farther into the interior. The American missionaries in the Sasoon region, Revs. Cole and Raynolds, the latter a physician, are at present the only foreign agents at work there in this way. The late occurrences in this city and vicinity, as well as those in Trebizond, and we hear at present rumors of similar occurrences elsewhere, make it certain that among the Armenians there will be a great amount of suffering during the coming winter months.

Owing to the universal excitement consequent on the recent massacres, there have undoubtedly been modifications of the relief system originally adopted by the missionaries at Van and elsewhere. That system, at once simple and effective, is thus described in a recent letter from Dr. Grace Kimball, at Van:

At the present time, and since the departure of Dr. Raynolds for Sassoun early in July, I and the dining room have been completely squelched, by order of the Vali Governor. During this time I have given my time and strength to the administration of the relief funds that have come in from England and America. I have put it into the form of industrial relief, and have a corps of some 350 workers—washing, carding, spinning, sizing, and weaving cotton and wool. I pay off, on an average, about sixty workers daily—all of them wretchedly, abject-ly poor—and the pittance they thus earn keeps the wolf from the door.

I most earnestly hope to be able to keep it going through this coming hard winter but funds come in slowly, and now Mr. Cole writes that they are hard up and that they can take no more of my wares. I should be in despair save for my confidence in the good Providence that has been over this enterprise from the first. I believe that the moral effect will be a great feature of this relief work, as contrasted with gratuitous charity. And I feel that our being able to do it, and thus help the people in their present deep distress, is going to conduce to the greater success of the evangelistic work. It is showing the people that our religion is one of deed and of truth, as well as of the word.

Few public men have greater influence with the Armenian people than Mgr. Izmirlian, the Patriarch at Constantinople, whose portrait appears on this page. He has held various offices in the Church, and was ordained as Patriarch in early 1894. During the recent riots in the capital, it was apparent that even his great influence was powerless to check the rising tide of indignation against the Turkish government for its infamous conduct toward the Christians of Armenia.

Advices by cable show that great destitution is prevailing in the interior of Ar- [illegible] and that the suffering from the prolonged want this year is far greater even than that which followed the massacres a year ago. Relief funds are being applied in a number of districts to good purpose, but so extensive is the need that, as in the case of our Western farmers last winter, the amount of relief afforded has not yet perceptably lessened the suffering. Famine is seemingly inevitable in several [illegible] now in Africa, Where the Natives Regard it with Wonder—Snow in the City of Jerusalem, also a Sight to Marvel at.

AT this season of the year, when old and young in our own land are looking forward to such winter pleasures as sleigh-rides, skating, and other sports which Jack Frost brings in his train, it will be a surprise to most of our readers to look at the two photographic illustrations on this page. Snow in Jerusalem and in South Central Africa are far from being among the things one would naturally expect to find in tropical and semi-tropical countries. It is a fact, however, that although the ancient capital of David is in the balmy East, and enjoys an uninterrupted summer of seven months, that section of Palestine is sometimes visited by severe winter storms. As the city lies in a mountainous region, fully twenty-five hundred feet above sea level, snow occasionally falls there, although never in considerable quantities. It generally melts within a few hours after sunrise. On rare occasions it has been known to remain on the ground for several days. On the particular occasion when the photograph was taken, the snow was light and totally disappeared before noon.

Winter in Palestine is usually brief, but while it endures it causes much suffering among the poor natives, as fuel is scarce and dear, and in severe weather they cannot gather the roots and dry twigs upon which they mainly depend for their fires. Native houses are, however, very substantially built, with thick walls, which serve to keep the occupants warm in winter and cool in summer. To very many, a heavy snow is a somewhat serious matter, as when it melts, it softens the mud-baked walls and on drying again in the sun, they frequently crack and cause the building to become dangerous and uninhabitable. October and November are the stormiest months in Palestine and usher in the snow, wintry storms and tempests that are frequently referred to in Scripture. (Psalms 148: 8 and 55: 8.)

In South Central Africa, snow is even a greater novelty than at Jerusalem. The photograph here reproduced was taken by a member of an English military surveying expedition at a point where, although the mountains are snow-capped in winter, a snowfall on the plains was an experience that had not happened before, in the memory even of the oldest inhabitant. Naturally, it excited a great deal of wonder and the natives, doubtless, went about shivering and uncomfortable while it lasted.

SNOW IN JERUSALEM — A SNOWSTORM IN SOUTH CENTRAL AFRICA.

Healthful Laughter.

A good laugh, hearty and innocent, is an excellent tonic and refreshes one more than medicine. It helps one for the duties of the day. It has been said that every laugh reddens the blood. Whether it be true or not, it is quite certain that a cheerful nature can do more good than a surly one—

A merry heart goes all the day,
A sad tires in a mile.

Some very excellent people have got the idea that if they are converted they must quiet down and live as though they stood in the chamber of the dying. True "life is short and life is earnest;" but the most holy life is not necessarily the most gloomy. The joyous Christian makes the best impression and will, all other things being equal, lead the greater number of souls to Christ.

Marriage in Armenia.

The marriage ceremony in Armenia is very simple. When two design to marry, the pastor must first ascertain that they who wish to marry are not relations. Then they send for the chief pastor, who takes two rings, one for the bride and the other for the bridegroom, and on the day of marriage they go to the church-gate, where he asks them whether they want to marry, and then he asks both of them: "Do you intend to marry?" They both say yes. Pastor (addressing himself to the bridegroom), says: "If the wife should become poor, or sick, or lame, would you then assist her?" "Yes," and the bride answers a similar question in the same manner; and then they enter the church together with a witness: a Testament and a cross are given to both bride and bridegroom; and then they pray. The pastor then reads the Bible and Testament, and a portion of the Prophets. After this, he ties a cord on each of their necks, of white and red color, which is sealed with sealing-wax; and they are not permitted to see each other for three days. After three days they come again to the church, where the pastor unseals them: after this they live together in matrimonial bonds.

"Womsn" and "Lady."

A well-known writer has lately been recording her opinion on the proper use of the words "lady" and "woman." She thinks a too free use has so cheapened the beautiful word "lady" by applying it without meaning that many prefer to say "woman." The use of the term "lady" is plainly courteous. Even when the street car conductor cautions us, "Don't get off, lady, till the car stops," or the cash-girl calls at us, "Here's your change, lady," we realize that they mean it courteously. "Woman, here's your change," would be distinctly unpleasant, even though strictly true, and not meant to be impolite. The writer referred to adds that in her opinion "general usage sums the matter up, and we come to understand that in speaking of the 'adult female of the human race' in relation to her occupation, we must say woman—a woman artist, a woman writer, a scrub-woman, and in speaking of her as an individual, we may, with courtesy, say 'lady;' while in directly addressing her we may, with courtesy, propriety, and truth, say 'madam.'"

Cultivating the Emotions.

It is the duty of all to cultivate the tender emotions of the soul. Passing them by as things not to be fostered and sustained, tends to divest the soul of all that beautifies it and makes it unlovable. We have seen fathers who seem to think it a weakness to kiss and caress the little child. We have seen men who evidently regarded it as unmanly to admire the sweet flowers that grace the home and garden. We have seen those who would not stop to listen to some sweet music floating out upon the twilight air; and some that see no beauty in the grand mirror that nature holds up. Oh, how we pity these that have no love for the beautiful in this world, and close the doors of their souls to all the tender emotions that make human beings lovable and human. They seems to us like the gnarled and ungainly tree without its green foliage, or the rough rocky mountains without its creeping vines and verdue. In short, their lives are just a mass of rocks and hills standing out in their bare, ungainly proportions.

Household Religion.

Happy are the children of true Christian parents! Happy are the parents of Christian children, sending forth into the future prolonged influences for good, permanently represented on the earth by intelligence and virtue long years after they themselves have ascended to heaven! How miserable the estate of those whose names must go down to posterity linked with creatures of wretchedness, vice and crime! Too late for repentance do such behold the legitimate outcome of the absence of household religion. Some have we seen whose own parents had left in their hearts and lives a precious legacy of Christian faith and love divine. Yet they themselves were not pious, and so were making a break in the chain, and defrauding their children of that boon which should have passed on without diminution. Those children had no godly influences around them, and hence in the hour of temptation would have no sweet memories to hold them fast, and in the stress of the world's conflicts they would be almost sure to deteriorate. An impaired vitality of virtue would probably be passed on in turn to their children, and so the stock would degenerate.

IF I KNEW.

IF I knew the box where the smiles are kept,
No matter how large the key,
Or strong the bolt, I would try so hard,
'Twould open I know for me.
Then over the land and the sea, broadcast
I'd scatter the smiles to play,
That the children's faces might hold them fast,
For many and many a day.

If I knew a box that was large enough
To hold all the frowns I meet,
I would like to gather them, every one,
From nursery school to street;
Then folding and holding I'd pack them in,
And turning the monster key,
I'd hire a giant to drop the box,
To the depth of the deep, deep sea.

Hindu Village Life.

Village life in India has no counterpart anywhere. To see a village one must go to it, live in it, mingle with its people, and become acquainted with its families. He must talk with the people, and become familiar with their habits, customs, ways; he must learn the village tradition, its history, who built it, when, and why. And there are villages and villages. They are not all alike; they may look alike to the casual observer, but they are not all alike, any more than people are all alike. See that large village up on the hill, where it has climbed to keep its feet out of the wheat and barley fields. In the centre is a house taller and larger than the rest. That is the home of the head-man. He is an important personage; he learns everything from the gossips of the town and from the visitors from the neighboring markets. His piano is a goat skin stretched over a wide hoop. He has grown up where he is, and will die there. His class will form one day the backbone, yea, the body and heart, of the Christian church now forming in India. His desires can hardly be called immoderate. They include a mud-walled house, roofed with tiles or thatch; about two pounds of flour daily, with a modicum of oil and spices, for his own consumption, and for his wife and children in proportion; a moderate wardrobe, half a dozen brass water-pots and cooking dishes; two or three yoke of bullocks, a milch buffalo, and a few rude agricultural implements. Such is his notion of comfort.

The average villager, however, is a poor man. Fully fifty millions of the population, a number yearly increasing, are dragging out, on India's plains, a miserable, cheerless, dreary, and almost hopeless existence.

Childhood's First Five Years.

The first five years, says a writer in Advance in Education, are considered by thoughtful educators to be the most important. During these years the child has accomplished more through the awakening of all its senses and faculties, if properly treated, than through any subsequent period of same duration, and as these first impressions are the foundation of all future work, how great the responsibility, and with what patient care on the part of parents should these children be brought into true relations with their surroundings.

Prayer-Meeting Killers.

THERE is a class of people who roam the land, making fearful havoc. They swing no tomahawk. They sound no war-whoop. But their track is marked by devastation. I mean that class of persons who go from church to church, charged with the mission of talking religious meetings to death. One of the chiefs of this barbarian tribe of prayer-meeting killers is the expository man. He is very apt to rise with a New Testament in his hand, or there has been some passage that during the day has pressed heavily on his mind. It is probably the first chapter of Romans, or some figurative passage from the Old Testament. He says, for instance: "My brethren, I call your attention to Hosea, 7th and 8th: 'Ephraim is a cake not turned.' You all know the history of Ephraim. Ephraim was—ah—well! He was a man mentioned in the Bible. You all know who he was. Surely no intelligent audience like this need to be told who Ephraim was. Now, the passage says that he was a cake not turned. There are a good many kinds of cake, my brethren! There is the Indian cake, and the flannel cake, and the buckwheat cake. Now, Ephraim was a cake not turned. It is an awful thing not to be turned. My friends, let us all turn!"

It sometimes happens that this undesirable character confines himself to the meetings of his own church. Interesting talkers are sometimes detained at home by sickness; but his health is always good. Others dare not venture out in the storm; but all the elements combined could not keep him from his place. He has the same prayer now that he has used for the last twenty years. There is in it an allusion to the death of a prominent individual. You will be surprised when he tells. The fact is, he composed that prayer about the time that General Jackson died, and he has never been able to drop the allusion. He has a patronizing way of talking to sinners, as much as to say: "Ho! you poor, miserable scalawags, just look at me, and see what you might have been."

The land is strewn with the carcasses of prayer-meetings slain by these religious desperadoes. They have driven the young people from most of our devotional meetings. How to get rid of this affliction is the question with hundreds of churches. We advise your waiting on such persons, and telling them that, owing to the depraved state of public taste, their efforts are not appreciated. If they still persist, tell them they must positively stop or there will be trouble. As you love the Church of God, put an end to their ravages. It is high time that the nuisance was abated.

Dram-shops.

THE dram-shop is a great caldron of iniquity in our time. Anacharsis said that the vine bore three grapes: the first was pleasure, the next was drunkenness, and the next misery. Every saloon above ground or under ground is a fountain of iniquity. It may have a license and it may go along quite respectably for a while, but after a while the cover will fall off and the color of the iniquity will be displayed.

"Oh," says some one, "you ought to be easier on such a traffic as that when it pays such a large revenue to the government, and helps support your schools and your great institutions of mercy." And then I think of what William E. Gladstone said—I think it was the first time he was Chancellor of the Exchequer—when men engaged in the ruinous traffic came to him and said their business ought to have more consideration from the fact that it paid such a large revenue to the English government. Mr. Gladstone said: "Gentlemen, don't worry yourselves about the revenue; give me thirty millions of sober people, and we'll have revenue enough and a surplus."

We might in this country—this traffic perished—have less revenue, but we would have more happy homes, and we would have more peace, and we would have fewer people in the penitentiary, and there would be tens of thousands of men who are now on the road to hell who would start on the road for heaven.

But the financial ruin is a very small part of it. This iniquity of which I speak takes everything that is sacred out of the family, everything that is holy in religion, everything that is infinite in the soul, and tramples it under foot. The marriage day has come; the twain are at the altar; lights flash, music sounds; gay feet go up and down the drawing-room. Did ever a vessel launch on such a bright and beautiful sea? The scene changes. Dingy garret; no fire. On a broken chair a sorrowful wife; last hope gone. Poor, forsaken, trodden under foot, she knows all the sorrows of being a drunkard's wife. "Oh," she says, "he was the kindest man that ever lived; he was so noble, he was so good! God never made a grander man than he was; but the drink did it, the drink did it!" Some day she will press her hands against her temples and cry: "Oh, my brain, my brain!" or she will go out on the abutment of the bridge some moonlight night, and look down on the glassy surface and wonder if under that glassy surface there is not some rest for a broken heart.

A celebrated doctor of France has recently discovered something which all drinkers ought to know. He has found out that alcohol in every shape, whether of wine or brandy or beer, contains parasitic life called bacillus potumaniæ. By a powerful microscope these living things are discovered, and when you take strong drink you take them into the stomach, and then into your blood, and getting into the crimson canals of life they go into every tissue of your body, and your entire organism is taken possession of by these noxious infinitesimals. When in delirium tremens a man sees every form of reptilian life, it is only these parasites of the brain in exaggerated size. It is not a hallucination that the victim is suffering from. He only sees in the room what is actually crawling and rioting in his own brain. Every time you take strong drink you swallow these maggots, and every time the imbiber of alcohol in any shape feels vertigo or rheumatism or nausea, it is only the jubilee of these maggots. Efforts are being made for the discovery of some germicide that can kill the parasites of alcoholism, but the only thing that will ever extirpate them is abstinence from alcohol and teetotal abstinence, to which I would before God swear all young men and old.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

L. M. Clinard, Salem, N. C. I heard a learned minister of the Gospel, a few Sundays since, affirm from the pulpit, that prayer here would do no good for persons in distant parts of the country. It seems to me that we need not send missionaries, but pray for the conversion of the heathen.

It is apparent from your letter that you have misunderstood him. No preacher would make such a statement.

"One of the Least," Chicago, Ill. 1. Please tell of the Armenians as a nation. 2. Why are they called by some "Lazarites," because they cling to Christ in the face of death?

1. You will find this explained on page 603, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Sept. 18, 1895. 2. They may be so regarded by worldly, irreligious people, but Christians have nothing but admiration for them because of their steadfastness and their willingness to die rather than renounce Christ.

R. Powell, Wylam, Ala. If Christ died on Friday and rose on Sunday, how could he have been three days in the grave?

Many instances occur in the Bible of time being so reckoned. The Jews appear to have spoken of parts of days as whole days. Thus if he died on Friday that would be one day, Saturday would be the second, and Sunday would be spoken of as the third day. Many suggestions have been made to explain the difficulty, but this appears the most probable.

W. W. House, Ledgerwood, N. D. 1. Is it possible to explain the discrepancy between Mark and Luke as to the time of the Crucifixion? 2. Why is the command of Cyrus differently worded in II. Chronicles and Ezra?

1. There were two modes of reckoning the hours in use at the time. One was to reckon from sunrise to sunset, and the other from noon to midnight. One evangelist uses one method and the other, the other. It is probable that the Crucifixion took place about nine o'clock in the morning. 2. The writer of Chronicles may not have had the complete and formal document before him when he wrote. Ezra's account is doubtless the correct one, as he was a very careful writer, and from his official position would have access to the original edict, while the other was probably quoting from memory.

W. S. Moore, Gainsboro, N. C. In the two maps I have I do not find Van in Armenia or any other places of massacre, except Trebizond. How is Armenia bounded? 2. What her inhabitants? 3. Is it what we would call a State in this country? 4. Has it no head or Governor as we would call it, and no authority that could put down the rioters, if they would? 5. Is Mt. Ararat in this province?

Van is in the southeast part of Armenia, on the borders of Lake Van. It is in every good map of Turkey. You will also find, due west from Van, Moosh, Sassoun, Bitlis, Diarbekir, and other localities where massacres have taken place. For detailed answers to your other questions, see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 18th, 1895.

C. T., Wilkesbarre, Pa. Does the rule laid down in James 2: 10 imply that all crimes are equal in guilt?

No; it means that the violation of any of God's laws places the offender in the category of sinners. The writer is arguing with proud, self-righteous people who take credit to themselves for not committing certain sins. He shows them that in committing other sins that are not accounted by men so disgraceful, they are nevertheless sinners against God as surely as if they had committed the sins they condemn. A man who tells a lie has broken God's law and in that respect is under condemnation as the man is who commits a murder. Not that both are equally heinous, but that both stand on an equality in not being able to plead innocence before God. Both are sinners in need of mercy.

Constant Reader, Garden City, Mo. 1. Can a person become a Christian without the baptism of the Holy Spirit? 2. Is there no difference between baptism and the gift of the Holy Spirit?

1. As the word is usually understood, the baptism of the Holy Spirit was to confer special gifts for Christ's service. We have no reason to suppose that any man becomes a Christian without the influence of the Holy Spirit. The question is profitless, inasmuch as God gives the Holy Spirit freely. It would be impossible to state positively in what way the first impression comes in any individual case, but we may be sure that in some way the Holy Spirit's power has operated. This does not relieve any one from responsibility, because God is more willing to impart than men are to receive; but he does not force his gifts upon men. 2. All the difference between the human and the divine. A man is baptized of his own motion and by human hands. The gift of the Holy Spirit is from God.

D. C. P., Gales Ferry, Conn. Please explain the discrepancy between Joshua 11: 21-23 and Joshua 14: 12 and 15: 14. In the one case the statement is made that the Anakim were utterly destroyed, and in the other, Caleb is represented as fighting them at a later date.

No details are accessible beside those given in the Bible, but there does not appear to be any discrepancy. In Joshua 11: 22, one of the passages you refer to, three places are mentioned, in which the Anakim remained. As Caleb found Anakim on the mountain later on, it is reasonable to suppose that some of those living in those three places must have removed to the mountain to fill the places of those who had been killed.

L. Western, Columbus, O. Is it possible to ascertain the proportions of Catholics to Protestants in Europe?

Not accurately. In a Roman Catholic country a man is apt to set himself down a Catholic, though he may be practically an infidel, just as in England men who make no profession of religion are often credited to the Established Church. In round numbers the entire population of Europe is estimated at 350,000,000. These are divided roughly as follows: Roman Catholics 165,000,000; Protestants 90,000,000; members of Oriental churches 85,000,000; Jews 5,000,000; Mohammedans 5,000,000. Catholics overwhelmingly preponderate in France, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, Italy and Austria. In Germany, Great Britain, Norway and Sweden and Switzerland the Protestants are far more numerous than the Catholics.

E. S., Harmon, Colo. What is the mark of the beast? Ought we not to know exactly what it is that we may be careful to avoid it being placed upon us?

All that we know about the mark is that it will be enjoined by Antichrist in the last days. It will be necessary to all business transactions, as no one will be allowed to buy or sell but those who have the mark (See Rev. 13: 17). No one will be likely to assume it inadvertently. They will know perfectly well that it is some kind of passport or license indispensable to business. The distinguishing characteristic of it will be that in some way the number 666 will be contained in it, possibly by the aggregate of the numerical values of the letters of Antichrist's name.

A Sinner, ——. I am much concerned about my soul's salvation. I have been seeking to be saved, to make my peace with God, but my friends tell me there is no hope for me without making public profession of faith. They quote Matthew 10: 32, do you think it applies to my case?

It would not be right to make a public profession of faith unless, and until, you have found peace. When you feel sure that Christ saves you and you have given yourself in his keeping, you will be so full of love and gratitude to him, that you will want to make public confession of him. You will feel that it is a very small thing to do and that he is entitled to have you declare yourself his follower. The passage you mention is a warning such as want to evade the requirements of the Christian profession. Christ does not want the allegiance of any who are not prepared to make sacrifices, if need be, for his sake.

J. H. Gardner, Philadelphia. 1. Did Christ ascend unto heaven with the same body he had upon earth? If so, have not flesh and blood inherit the kingdom of God? 2. Do you know any book containing the Gospel song "Eternity's drawing nigh"?

1. The fact that the disciples recognized Christ after the resurrection and that the grave was empty when they visited it show that it was the same body. But changes have been wrought upon it, as you may see by examining the record of the various appearances. It is probable that it did not need food as sustenance, and we know that it entered the room when the doors were shut and that it was not limited as to the ordinary modes of travel. Paul's remark to which you refer, expressly intimates that such changes can take place in the body rendering it fit for the kingdom of God. 2. The song is in the "Sing Pilgrim" by the late Philip Phillips.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

RUSSIA IN ASIA.

RUSSIA'S intervention, in the interest of China, at the close of the war between that country and Japan, was a mystery to all who have not followed the history of the recent extension of Russian territory in Asia. What interest Russia could have in maintaining the integrity of the Chinese dominions, forcing Japan to relinquish the legitimate fruits of war, and raising the money China needed to pay the indemnity, was not obvious. A comparison of a modern map of Asia with one of a century old, will give a clue to the reason for her interest in the quarrel. At that time the northern boundary of China was contiguous with Russian territory. The Czar's dominions stretched from the Baltic on the west, to the Pacific on the east. No farther extension in that direction was possible. Any new territory to be added had to be on the south. Between the Caspian Sea and China's western boundary a number of independent nations occupied the region north of Persia and Afghanistan. During the past fifty years these nations have, one by one, fallen into the hands of Russia, and China has now that power for a neighbor on the west as well as on the north. If, therefore, Russia continues its advance, China is the land that is most likely to suffer. This explains why Russia had no objection to Japan weakening China, but a decided objection to her acquiring possession of any Chinese territory on the mainland. Whatever territory China may have to surrender, Russia will add to her own unwieldy empire. The countries recently annexed, although famous in history, are but little known to modern travelers. Russia, has, however, constructed a military railroad from the Caspian to Samarcand, which will open it up to trade and exploration. The ancient city, which is the terminus of the line, was once the favorite residence of the mighty Timur, and there, in a magnificent mosque, his remains are buried. Many other grand buildings adorn the city, but the greater number of them have fallen into decay. On the hill overlooking Samarcand is an ancient observatory, the first erected in Asia, and near it the ruins of a college founded by Ulug Beg, Timur's grandson. An ancient Mohammedan tradition existed that in the year 1868 a Mohammedan leader would rise from the dead and, under the name of "The Living King," appear in Samarcand and revive all the glories of the old city. In that year, however, instead of the Caliph appearing, the Russians besieged the city and captured it. It was a grievous disappointment to the Mohammedan believers, and many have since then lost faith in their religion. It is much to be wished that the men who were led to hope for a deliverer would, in their disappointment, be brought to look for Him who will surely come to deliver, not them only, but the whole world, from its sin and misery.

Unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation. (Heb. 9 : 28.)

Fatal Leap.

A dispatch from Poughkeepsie, N. Y., reports the death there of a man who hoped to win fame and fortune by a foolhardy feat. He was an Irishman, who boasted that he had leaped from some of the highest bridges in Great Britain. He was ambitious to leap from the railroad bridge at Poughkeepsie, which is 212 feet above the water at high tide, a feat which he declared, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding, had never been accomplished. He would do the daring deed and then go into a dime museum and perhaps on the stage. He wore a cork life-preserver, and had arranged for a boat to be under the bridge in readiness to pick him up after the leap. Climbing down to the lower girders of the bridge, he swung clear of the telegraph wires and dropped. Four seconds afterward he struck the water with a report like a pistol shot. Before the water settled again, he rose and was lifted into the boat. He was almost unrecognizable. Covered with bruises, his side lacerated, his rubicund face deadly pale, his eyes half closed and watery, bore witness to the violence of the shock. He was taken ashore and two physicians summoned. They examined him and pronounced his condition critical. They said he had suffered internal injuries which were probably fatal. Their opinion proved true. That evening, sixteen hours after taking the leap, he died. We honor a man who imperils his life for his country, or for the rescue of others; but a man like this, who imperils it for the sake of money, we despise. Yet their folly is greater who imperil their souls to make money as multitudes do. For them David's words would be an appropriate epitaph:

Died as the fool dieth. (II. Samuel 3 : 33.)

THE ANCIENT GATEWAY OF SAMARCAND, IN TURKESTAN.

An Invitation for Sale.

A few days before the wedding of the Duke of Marlborough to Miss Vanderbilt an advertisement appeared in the daily journals of New York which caused annoyance to both families. The advertiser announced that an invitation card admitting the holder to St. Thomas' church on Nov. 6, was for sale. Bids would be received up to Nov. 4, on which day it would be sent to the highest bidder. The advertisement was read in the Vanderbilt mansion with no little vexation. The only theory that could be suggested was that one or more invitation cards must have been stolen from the office where they were printed, or that some one had made a copy of the plate and was printing them. In order to prevent anyone gaining admission by such cards, it was decided to send a second note of invitation to each guest, with the request that it be presented at the door of the church as well as the original card. Thus the holder of the spurious card, being without the personal note, would be detected and excluded. This precaution relieved the family of all apprehension that undesirable guests who had bought their invitations would be present. No one believed that any invited guest would think so lightly of the privilege of witnessing the wedding as to prefer the money that could be obtained for it. Yet the act that seemed inconceivable in this case is only too common in a matter of infinitely greater moment. Christ likening the gospel invitation to the invitation to a marriage feast, intimated that among those who would not avail themselves of it would be some who would stay away for the sake of gain. And thus because of ambition or business pressure they sacrifice that inestimable privilege which transcends the worth of all the gold in the universe.

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul. Mark 8 : 36.

A Lost Identity.

A citizen of St. Louis, Mo., is involved in a curious dispute with the Dutch Government. The facts as related by the St. Louis Republic show how difficult an apparently simple matter may become. About three months ago, the parents of Frederick Jacob Schleicher, of St. Louis, were notified that he had just died in Java, and were instructed by the Dutch Government, in whose service he was, how to proceed for the inheritance of his property and a pension, which the government pays to the relatives of men who die in its service. As the Schleichers knew that their son had never been in the employ of the Dutch Government, and that he was then alive in St. Louis, they asked him to explain. He said that the man whose death was reported was doubtless his old friend and school-mate, Adam Deckelmann. Eighteen years ago, Deckelmann was trying for an appointment in Java under the Dutch Government, but was barred out because it was the rule not to accept any man of German birth who had not completed his period of service in the German army. Schleicher gave him his own certificate of service, and Deckelmann had gained the appointment and gone out under Schleicher's name. Deckelmann's family was accordingly notified, and they put in a claim for the property and pension. The government, however, would not recognize them. It replied that the dead man's name was Schleicher, and it had on record his declaration that his parents were the people to whom the notice of his death was originally sent. Schleicher is now preparing affidavits to prove that he is alive. He will probably have less difficulty in convincing the government of the fact than Deckelmann's parents will have in proving that it is their son who is dead. The government is sure to be sceptical when it is asked to discredit the man's own declaration as to his name and paternity. He did not forsee, when he made it, that the time might come when his family would be as much concerned in having it disbelieved, as he then was in having it believed. The day is coming when multitudes will be anxious to have a similar reversal of the record of their lives. They are anxious now to be counted with the world in its pleasures and honors, but in the day of Christ's glory they will want to be recognized among his people.

Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my words, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when he shall come in his glory. (Luke 9: 26.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A Great Convention on the Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held last week at Montclair, N. J. The sessions were continued from Nov. 10 to 17. One day was given to the Home Mission of the Women's Board.

It is Announced that a Distinguished Roman Catholic priest has become a convert to Protestantism and has joined Mr. O'Connor's church in New York. He is Dr. Anacletus Vanoli, a graduate of the Roman Propaganda and Missionary Apostolic of Constantinople.

It Cannot be Said that no Progress is being made in the direction of Christian unity when the Presbyterians and Methodists unite, as they did recently in Marlinsburg, Iowa, in holding evangelistic meetings. They were conducted by Rev. L. P. Rowland of Grand Rapids, Mich.

Rev. H. Loomis, the Agent of the American Bible Society in Japan, reports that he is meeting with much encouragement in his work, even the convicts being desirous to study Scripure, while a free circulation of the Bible continues throughout the army and has now extended to the navy.

The International Sunday School Lessons for the first six months of 1896 will be taken from the Gospel of Luke, and for the latter half year from the Old Testament, dealing with the lives and reigns of David and Solomon. The lessons for 1897 are to be on the early Christian Church based on passages from the Acts and the Epistles.

Rev. John T. Vine has been Holding Successful services at Westhill, N. Y. English papers speak in high terms of the good that has resulted from the services he held during his recent visit to that country in Mr. Charrington's East London Assembly Hall and other places. Mr. Vine's present address is 149 Fifth Avenue, New York.

A Great Missionary Meeting was held in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, on November 15. The meeting was the culmination of a week of missionary interest in the Presbyterian churches in the city. Ex-President Benjamin Harrison, Ex-Secretary of State Foster and Dr. F. E. Clark of the Christian Edneavor Society took part in the meetings.

Evangelistic Meetings were commenced last week in the Lexington Ave. Baptist Church, at 111th street, New York. Two services were held each day. Among the leaders were: Dr. A. C. Dixon, the Rev. E. M. Saunier, Rev. A. B. Simpson, Rev. Richard Hartley, Rev. E. E. Chivers, Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, Dr. E. B. Tyler, Rev. A. A. Cameron, Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, and Mrs. Isabella Charles Davis.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman's Services in Brooklyn have attracted large congregations and there have been some remarkable conversions. The Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Reformed churches of the Twenty-sixth ward united in the services. On November 10 Dr. Chapman preached to a crowded house at the New Lots Avenue Church. During the meetings several hundreds have made profession of faith.

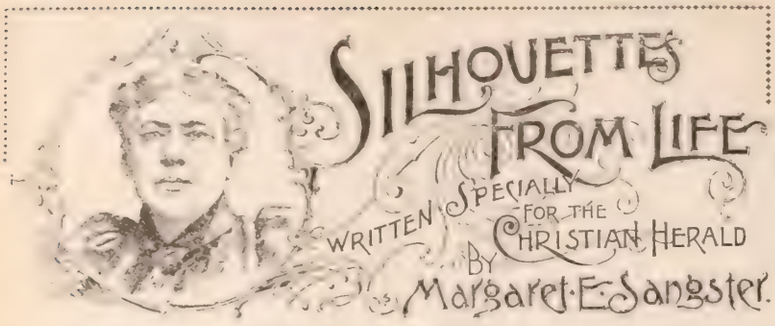
Statistics of the Beer Consumption of the United States have just been issued by the Department. These show that during the fiscal year ending June 30, the number of barrels manufactured and distributed was 33,469,661, an increase over the number of the previous year of 191,000 barrels. As each barrel contains thirty-one and a quarter gallons, the quantity of beer consumed during the year was over a thousand million gallons, which was more than was drunk in Germany. The production of beer in America of various kinds has increased fifty per cent. since 1888.

Madame Antoinette Sterling, who is Now on her way to this country after a successful work in England, had a farewell reception recently, at which she received a heart-shaped brooch, composed of diamonds, as a farewell gift from the National British Women's Temperance Union.

During a Recent Visit to Australia, Rev. M. Morton, a Presbyterian minister, inspected the Inebriate Asylum near Adelaide. Among the patients he found clergymen, doctors, lawyers, and men of culture. Mr. Morton was so impressed with the spectacle of men of genius and learning brought low by intoxicating liquor, that he resolved to devote his life to trying to save those sad wrecks of humanity, and help them regain their foothold in society and in the Church.

Red Cross Work in Cuba has been Commenced by the famous Papal missionary there, Dr. A. J. Diaz. The New York Independent has learned that he has organized and located seven Red Cross hospitals in the section where the fighting is most frequent and where the Spanish Government has about twenty thousand soldiers. At each station there are a native physician, two women nurses and about ten male helpers. The Spanish Government has given formal recognition of and satisfaction in the work.

The Mission on the East Side of New York known as "God's Providence Mission" has finally secured a home of its own. Mrs Percy R. Pyne widow of a well-known citizen, is the donor of both land and building. Two gifts of $38,000 each have been made by Mrs. Pyne to the trustees of the mission and with these the site on Broome street was bought and the substantial building erected. Bishop Potter, Dr. Morgan Dix and Archdeacon Tiffany took part in the dedication.



BY A ROUGH WAY.

"WHAT I need is faith."

The speaker tossed back the gray hair which fell over his forehead. His dark eyes were dim with tears. On the friend who stood beside him he turned a pale face, weary and grief-furrowed.

"Can you not trust?" said the lady, taking his thin hand in hers and smoothing it gently between her soft palms, "can you not trust in God? Ethel believed in Him, and she left you with a smile on her lips. Dick, you and I were young together. We joined the church at the same time. Where has your heart wandered that you have lost your hold on the Father's love?"

"If He had loved me," exclaimed the man, with sudden fierceness, "would He have taken from me the wife I adored, the son who would have carried on my name to posterity, the daughter who was all I had—all I had? How can I believe in a God who has robbed and plundered me, who leaves me smitten in my old age—a withered and fading tree. No, Caroline, you mean well, but you cannot comfort me nor give me help. I need faith, and I've lost it, lost it hopelessly."

His voice broke into a sob, quickly repressed. Obeying a gesture of entreaty and command, Mrs. Abercorn left the room and went to the other silent one across the hall, where Ethel Woodbury lay among the flowers, a fair statue of silence and peace, whom to-morrow they would lay away in a flower-lined grave. Colonel Woodbury had said truly that his life was hereafter to be desolate. With Ethel, he would lose out of his sight the last of his children, the darling of his old age.

Mr. Abercorn met his wife as she softly closed the door upon the dead, and gave her his arm to assist her down stairs.

"Were you able to help him!" he asked.

"Not the least bit," said the wife. "But it is something that she knows what would comfort him. Richard is aware that he must go to his Father before he can find rest."

"Well, dear, it does no good to preach to a man when he is in the depths. We must be quiet and pray for him night and day. Poor fellow, he has been led by a rough way."

From the garden, where a few late flowers lingered, little Katharine Abercorn came running to meet her parents. She was a sweet child, five years old, and generally a little sunbeam, but now her gayety was clouded. In her hands she held a tiny dead bird. Its ruffled feathers looked pitiful; its open beak had the effect of a frozen gasp.

"See, mother!" cried the child, "there's where the last song came through. Poor bird, it must have fallen from some nest or been blown from the tree."

Katharine was old for her age. She always spoke with the correctness of an older and more mature person, and her thoughts were often in advance of her years.

"It was God's bird," she added. "He hadn't birds enough in heaven and He wanted this one and sent for it, I suppose. Just like dear Aunt Ethel, God has two homes, one up yonder," said the child, lifting a wee dimpled finger to the skies, "and one here. Both God's homes must be good, I think. Don't you, mother?"

"Come to me, little girl."

It was Dr. Woodbury who called her. Katharine went to him, and clung to his hand as he walked with her through the garden, picking here and there a leaf or a [illegible].

"There are very few flowers left," he said, "the cold wind will soon come, and the snow, and then all will be gone. But I do not care much, Ethel will not be here to see the garden another year."

"There are flowers in heaven," said little Katharine, looking up with her sweet eyes that knew no doubt. "Heaven is God's great garden, and Ethel will be there. I should think we would not be sorry for dear Auntie, now she's gone to heaven."

"How do you know, my dear," said the Doctor.

"I don't know how I know; I just know, because I ask the blessed Lord, and I hear what he tells me."

Late that night, long after Katharine had fallen asleep upon her white pillow, the desolate father knelt and called upon God. He asked to have the darkness removed, to see again the Saviour's face, as once it had shined upon him, to possess, even in sorrow and loneliness, the feeling of the Divine presence. And at last, soothed and tranquilized, he paid a last visit to the chamber where his beautiful Ethel slept her last night in the home which had cradled her infancy, and seen her grow into happy maidenhood. Her illness had been too short to take away the rounded look of health; it was as if the angel of death had dared the angel of life in combat, and as if life had simply declined the battle, stept aside, and left the fair house vacant. The father stooped and kissed the cold brow.

"I am sure," he said to himself, "that Ethel is with the Lord."

Then, into the hush of his soul there stole this word, audibly, as if spoken:

"That where I am, ye may be also:" and with that there swept over him a wave of peace, a great and blessed calm. He sought his bed, and slept. Next morning, when he met the Abercorns at breakfast, a new light shone in his look. He extended his hand cheerfully, and his first greeting was this:

"I have laid down my weapons of rebellion. I have found the Lord once more. I cannot tell you how it has all come about, but I have been guided into a new world. Lonely as I must be henceforth, I will not be desolate, for faith has again become possible. I believe in God Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, and in Jesus Christ His Only Son, our Lord."

They carried Ethel to the grave, and placed her beside her mother and brother, The father returned to his vacant home, and took up life's duties once more, with a brave spirit which astonished his friends. His pastor was gladdened by his frequent presence at the prayer-meeting. To the poor he was open-handed and generous. For years he had toiled to accumulate a fortune, that he might leave wealth and a name to his children. But now the children were gone, and there came to him the deeper insight that they have who have found the straight and narrow way, and are walking therein. All children were God's, and were, therefore, his brothers and sisters, so that Dr. Woodbury's benefactions flowed like a tide, and had no ebb.

There never came a day when he could explain precisely how it was that he entered on the broader, happier life, but he always knew that the world had slipped between him and God, that God had led him back by a rough pathway, and that a little child's prattling words and simple trust had finally placed his hand once more in the hand that was pierced.

Young Converts in the New Sunday Schools Planted by Our Missionary in the South-west—A Promising Outlook.

REV. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School missionary in the South-west, has forwarded a very interesting report of the recent progress of his work in Missouri. He writes:

At Primrose schoolhouse I organized a Sunday School in a former year, which I have encouraged since by occasional visits. A number of souls have been converted, and the Sunday School has been blessed.

The other photograph is a picture of a log cabin, inhabited by a family of five persons. In a drive of five and one-half miles, the number of cabins which we saw and heard of was only nine. The picture was taken from the cabin nearest the school house, about half a mile distant. The school house is a small frame, and a better building than any dwelling near it. Missouri has one of the largest school funds of any State in the Union, and it is not a rare thing for the school house to be superior to the dwellings in the district, though this is far from being invariably the case; for many school houses are poor buildings, and very uncomfortable in cold weather. This school-house and cabin are in the hill country, between Big Creek and the Chariton River. There are many cabins on each side of that river, which, having its source in Iowa, runs in a southerly direction through North Missouri about one hundred miles and empties inbox houses are numerous in many other portions of my field. "Box house" is a name applied to a small, rude structure, generally of very rough material, and often not plastered — ordinarily hot in summer and cold in winter.

This state has many excellent public schools, not a few academies and colleges, besides the State University and three State Normal Schools. Many of its people, living in good homes and prosperous communities, where good schools and churches are ample, would be surprised, I am sure, to see the moral destitution that exists in out-of-the-way places. A few years ago a man in my field complained about the impression going abroad that there was any considerable need in this field which was unreached by ordinary church work. I could make considerable allowance for his blunder, for I might have made a similar mistake, though a native of this state, had not my missionary work opened my eyes to see the facts in the outlying districts and waste places.

Not more than ten miles from the town in which he lived and preached a short time, I had labored in a district having, as I was credibly informed, one hundred and fourteen persons of age for the day school. They had no Sunday School. I visited them from house to house, and addressed the people on Sunday at the school house, and with much effort organized a Sunday School, to which that community contributed exactly fifty cents, and I donated from the literature of The American Sunday School Union all their supplies above that paltry sum. I revisited them once, and they have since been blessed with a revival meeting and numerous conversions, and conditions are now better with them.

Omitting, for the sake of brevity, much of my work for the last six months, from April 1st to October 1st, I report concerning Sunday Schools: Whole number organized, addressed, etc., 39, having 172 teachers, and 2064 scholars. I have been exposed to more rain and mud, and more hard work, than for some years past; and to this exposure I attribute an illness that came upon me in August, from which I recovered so far as to resume my work, but on September 22nd I was overtaken in a storm of wind and rain, accompanied by a cold wave, the temperature falling between thirty and forty degrees in a short time. I was wet and cold nearly four hours before I could get to a fire, and my illness returned; but I praise God I am now recovering. On the day above mentioned I had addressed a Sunday School and preached. Many promised to meet me in heaven.

THE LAST LOAF.

AT the recent meeting in Brooklyn of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions Mrs. M. E. Logan related a pathetic incident of her early experiences as a missionary. She and her husband, the famous Rev. R. W. Logan, went out together to Micronesia. They soon found that the people were cannibals of a most savage and treacherous type. A feast was approaching, and there were some who were to participate in it who were eager to have the newly arrived white man and his wife for viands as a change from the dusky people who were usually devoured at the ghastly rites past. It was only in after years, when the Gospel had made its way, and the missionaries had made friends with the natives, that they learned how near in those early days they were to a horrible death. They knew enough, however, from the demeanor of the savages to be aware then that some plot against them was under discussion; but they committed themselves to the keeping of Him whom they served, and he saved them from the evil designs of their enemies.

It seemed, however, though a more lingering death awaited them. The ship that took them to the islands had with them a store of provisions sufficient to support them until its return. Mr. and Mrs. Logan thought they would be dependent on this store but would be able, through the kindness of the natives, to exchange for a supply of fresh food. But the natives were hostile, and not only refused to furnish them with food, but stole provisions from their stores. The stock was getting low day by day—at last, nothing but a single barrel of flour remained. How careful it was husbanded Mrs. Logan remembers vividly to this day. The ship was due, but the weather was stormy, the coast dangerous, and it did not come. The flour diminished daily, and they looked from the only provision between them and starvation, to the horizon, in the hope of seeing the sail that would bring them of relief coming. At last, the bottom of the barrel was reached. There was only sufficient for one more loaf. Their faith had not failed, but now it was tried to the uttermost. They knelt and committed themselves to God. Then Mrs. Logan took the flour, and, like the widow who befriended Elijah, made it into a loaf, that if God so willed, they should eat it and die. But God had many years of work for them yet to do. While that last loaf was baking, the long expected vessel bringing them supplies, came in sight, and that night, with full hearts, the missionary and his wife gave thanks to God, and wept tears of joy over the abundant provision that had come to them in their extremity. Mrs. Logan is now enjoying a furlough in this country, but her heart is still with the people among whom she and her husband labored so many years.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

IS THE HEART RIGHT?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Dec 1. Prov. 4: 20-27.

THE important part taken by the heart in the physical system, corresponds to the part that theology assigns to it in the spiritual system. When theologians speak of the heart, they refer to the motive forces of the soul. The affections, the passions, the disposition, the will, are all included in the idea conveyed by the word, "heart." Thus, as the heart receives the blood, purified and invigorated, and sends it to every part of the body, so the heart, in the theological sense, sends vitality into speech and conduct. Consequently, the necessity of having the heart right is obvious. No matter how brilliant or how learned a man may be, he will be a misery to himself and a curse to all about him, if he be arrogant, cruel, or malignant. So matter how beautiful and accomplished a woman may be, if she is selfish, fretful, or malicious, she will be wretched herself, and be the cause of wretchedness in the home. Sweetness of disposition, kindness, gentleness, love – these affect the life far more than mental gifts. That is what Solomon meant by keeping the heart with all diligence, because out of it come the issues of life. Now, heredity apart, it is conceivable that a child might be so trained as to keep his heart in this delightful condition. He might be helped by careful culture to develop the kindly side of his nature and to repress the evil side. Some children come into the world with a strong tendency to evil. We see this more in infants, and some are much worse than others. In some families, every child born has a proclivity to certain vices, but even with these it has been proved that the evil may be counteracted and the opposite virtues developed, by judicious culture. Unhappily the child seldom gets this training, and his character develops on the lines laid down by nature. The evil is unrestrained, and it predominates in life and conduct.

The question then arises, whether, when the discovery is made, as it is sure to be made by every thoughtful boy and girl, that there is evil at the centre of the spiritual being, it is possible to extirpate it. Or is it possible only to reform the conduct? This question lies at the root of all theology. It is not pleasant to think that one must go through life with his hand forever grasping the throat of the wild beast within him, afraid, that if for an instant he relaxes his grip, or remits his vigilance, his life and the lives of others connected with him, will be desolated. We can imagine God looking on such a person with infinite pity. He does more than this; he offers help. Nothing is more certain in Christianity than the promise it holds out of this radical change. Indeed, undergoing it is an essential to entering the kingdom of Christ. Churches count for nothing in this matter. A child may have been baptized by a bishop, may have been received into church membership by an apostolic pastor, but he is no member of Christ's kingdom if he has not had his heart changed. How is this possible? But when we come to ask how it is done, the method becomes reasonable. Christ proposes to bring men into communion with God. It is the Spirit that works the change. Thus attempts at self-reformation count for little, except as showing the desire for reform. The power is of God, and the way to get the heart right is to go to him in humble, sincere prayer, asking him to exercise the power and effect the change.

THE CHRISTIAN'S WARFARE.

I LOVE to fight against the foes
Which everywhere arise.
And as my faith much stronger grows,
Work for a heavenly prize.

Bright jewels from above I seek,
Far more than earthly kind,
For in my Saviour, lowly, meek,
My firmest friend I find.

My enemies are truly strong,
And treacherous as well:
They try to lead me in the wrong.
And to eternal hell.

The hosts of sin plan every way
To tear my fortress down;
But in my fortress I will stay
To win a starry crown.

True honor, truth, and righteousness
Must all our weapons be;
Then will our lot be happiness,
And we'll our Saviour see.

WHEN CHRIST COMES.

What will be the Condition of the World and the Church at the Second Advent.

An Address by REV. A. FAUSSET.

YOU will observe that the woman described in Rev. 17 represents the apostate church. Man was made in the image of his God; and in proportion as he reflects that image is he truly godly, for the woman here had apostatized from God. Instead of witnessing for her Lord against the world, she was leaning upon the world; for I doubt not that the beast is the god of the opposing world-power—the world at enmity against God. What are the waters of the Euphrates which are to be dried up? I think the key you will find here: the waters upon which the woman sits are "peoples, and tongues, and nations." It says she sits upon many waters; so "sitting upon many waters" and "upon the beast" represent much the same thing. The name given to her is Babylon, the city situated upon the river Euphrates. You remember it was by turning the course of this river Cyrus was enabled to overcome Babylon, and to make the way open for the return of the Jews to their own land. Now, it would seem that as the woman represents the apostate church, the waters of the Euphrates, upon which Babylon is situated—(and she is identified with Babylon)—represent "peoples, nations, tongues," upon which apostate Christendom has sat.

And now, what is occurring before our eyes? We are speaking of the state of the world in the last times, and how far that state corresponds to the state of the world at the present time. You will see that already the beast's world-power, the countries of Italy, France, Spain, Austria have turned upon her; and it is a remarkable thing that, just as the temporal power was first given in 754, by Pepin, a usurping king of France, so it was a usurping king, Louis Napoleon, that was instrumental in destroying the temporal power. Others refer the waters of the Euphrates to the Turkish Empire. I believe the two are true. I believe the expressions about Babylon refer, not only to the mystical Babylon, but to the literal Babylon of the Turkish or Saracenic power.

Observe that the beginning of the Turkish power and the Romish power was about the same time. In 606 the Emperor Phocas gave power to the existing Pope, about the same time that Mahomet retired to his cave; and in our own time we have the waters of the Euphrates being dried up simultaneously with the waning of the power of the Turkish Empire. And why? To prepare the way of "the kings of the east." Who are they? Primarily, as we see by the references to Cyrus, it is the Jews who are so designated. And then, spiritually, who are the "kings of the east?" We know how the Revelation begins—"Now to him that loved us, and washed us from our sins, and hath made us kings and priests to God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Believers are the kings of the east; they come to him who is returning by the way of the east. The kings of the east return with the returning King: "His feet shall stand upon the Mount of Olives, which is in the east of Jerusalem" (for, as we believe in a literal return, so we believe in a literal Israel returning to their own land); and he shall return to inflict the last blow upon his enemies. So at last, after the centuries of confusion and misrule, the world will pass under the perfect and beneficent government of the Prince of Peace.

...NADJA;...

BY OLIVER M. NORRIS.

THE RETURN OF SERGEI AND MIKHAIL.

CHAPTER XX.

WHAT a woeful, anxious winter it was in Radovo! Mikhail watched day and night by the bed of his young barin, Nadja with like untiring vigilance nursed the Countess. For many a week it was an unvarying report of two lives slowly ebbing away in the wasting delirium and frenzy of fever. Then followed a day or two of tenser anguish, when hope seemed slowly and surely to leave the watchers, and the surgeon gravely shook his head, and took Nadja's hand to comfort her.

At last the change came. It was an afternoon late in February, the afternoon of a day of glorious sunshine and spring thaw. The surgeon entered the long, low hut where Sergei lay, and as he approached the sick man a feeble hand was stirred to greet him.

"Thank you, doctor. How is she?"

"Who, Sister Olga? Better, my boy. I have just left her. The worst is over. She has just been asking how you are."

Sergei's face shone like the sun's.

Very slowly, but surely, convalescence followed. Sergei grew happy as a king, and as radiant as a boy. Nadja came in three or four times a day to relieve Mikhail, and bearing sweet, coy messages from her friend. Mikhail would be sent across to the nurse's quarters to inquire how the Countess fared. As they grew a little stronger scraps of paper passed between them, and the Countess kept Sergei's scraps under her pillow, and Sergei kept her answers under his.

It was sad news to Sergei when, one afternoon, Nadja came with a note to say that the Countess was now well enough to travel, that she had received orders to proceed to headquarters, and that they were to start that night on their journey southward.

"Good-bye," ended the note. "I shall look forward eagerly to seeing you. Perhaps you will also be ordered south. I believe important movements are shortly expected. But if I do not see you again during the campaign, we shall surely meet at home, at dear Krasnaya Balka, perhaps in the old English garden under the arbor-vitæ. Good-bye, and God bless you."

Sergei's evening was spent in one brown study after another. If her departure saddened him, the words Olga wrote cheered him, and once or twice, as he turned the sentences over and over in his mind, he [illegible] and smiling.

It was towards nightfall of the same day that an orderly entered the hospital-hut and stood at the salute beside him.

"Colonel Alekhin?"

"Captain, if you please," said Sergei.

"This letter and packet from the general commanding are addressed to Colonel Alekhin."

[illegible]

The orderly handed over the letter and a small package. Sergei's face flushed crimson. He tore open the letter.

"SIR,"—it began—"The Grand Duke desires me to inform you that, in recognition of your splendid valour, and your services and sufferings for the Fatherland, he has much pleasure in appointing you Colonel of the Staff, and in begging your acceptance of the accompanying St. George's Cross. It is the Grand Duke's wish that as soon as you are strong enough, you will return to Russia, in order to regain complete health. As soon as peace is restored, His Imperial Highness hopes that, when you are next in St. Petersburg, he may have the pleasure of becoming personally acquainted with so gallant an officer."

It was quite dark when Mikhail came in to prepare his master for bed. He found him still staring at the letter.

CHAPTER XXI.

Home from the War.

As the war dragged its slow length along, the general occasionally heard from his nephews, from Sergei more often than from Vladimir. Sergei's letters were a short, crisp chronicle of events, just like what one soldier might be expected to write to another. The general, however, took no interest in them. Vladimir's contained little beyond demands for money, covering the whole gamut of request, from whining petition to truculent threat. All the money he could lay his hands on he sent to Vladimir, the proceeds of another mortgage on the estate were sent to him. There was no satisfying him. His losses at cards were continuous and heavy. At his wits' end to supply him, the weak old man, believing that his precious nephew's honor was at stake, was at last obliged to notify his man of business in St. Petersburg to arrange for the sale of Slavo.

"What does it matter?" the general thought, or gradually accustomed himself to think. "When the war is over he'll marry Olga Navrotska and have plenty. I myself don't want much more; my day is over. My pension will be enough for me. But then there is Sergei——"

What provision to make for Sergei puzzled him. It was July now, and Sergei was coming home. He had heard of his magnificent defence of the pass in the Balkans, of his promotion and decoration, and could not but feel a glow of satisfaction at the [illegible] If it was only Vladimir who was returning on the morrow! was the general's wish on the eve of Sergei's home-coming.

Sergei was speeding over his beloved [illegible] Kief, thinking the minutes hours, with his heart welling over with love to the old man at home, building castles in the air with Olga Navrotzka in every stately room of them.

The news that Sergei and Mikhail were coming home sped like wildfire through Slavo. A letter from Mikhail to his mother apprised the villagers that they had been ordered home invalided, but it was only when the general gave orders to have the old travelling carriage sent to Kief to meet them, that they knew when they might be expected. A village meeting was held on the eve of the arrival, and it was resolved to keep the next day as a holiday, and in deference to the well-known views both of Sergei and Mikhail, each one present at the meeting pledged himself to abstain from vodka during the entire day A mixed committee of Orthodox and Stundists was appointed to meet the returning soldiers at a point out on the steppe on the far side of the river, and escort them to their homes. There was a new Uriadnik, who had been winning golden opinions of all men, and he was entrusted with the bread and salt of welcome.

Sergei and Mikhail in due course arrived at Kief, and there, outside the railway station, stood the dusty lumbering carriage and the dusty old paunchy, jolly-looking coachman, his face wreathed in smiles. They moved swiftly through the outskirts of the Pilgrim City, and out on to the steppe, through long miles of heavy nodding grain.

The two men lay back in the carriage, basking in the July sun, too happy, too full of pleasant memories and anticipations to trouble one another with remarks or their driver with questions. As they topped one of the long undulations of the steppe, and looked along the white ribbon of road before them they saw a cloud of dust, and could distinguish the figures of horsemen galloping rapidly towards them. In front rode an important looking personage in semi-uniform, and as he approached nearer he was seen to carry something tied up in a red handkerchief. The travellers speedily recognized them, and stood up in the carriage which they had ordered to halt. The horsemen were now around them covered with dust, sweating, their eyes sparkling with pleasure, hurrahing with all their might, and eagerly stretching forward their hands to be shaken. The Uriadnik produced a white plate, and on it a piece of black rye bread and some salt. Then the Uriadnik marshalled his men behind the carriage, and on went the procession with great noise and jubilation. It was a wonderful home-coming, and every one was happy.

There was just one note of discord, and both Sergei and Mikhail could not notice it. It was when the general was mentioned. From letters received months ago Sergei knew that Grisha was staying at the house—he did not know what the villagers knew, he knew nothing of recent events, but felt in some intangible way that there was something of pain or sorrow or shame awaiting at home to be revealed to him, something that made his friends here silent and hang their heads.

Here they were at the ferry, and the whole village was there on the other side dressed in its best, and cheering with all its might. Although the disappearance of old Sozontieff was known to them Nadja had not mentioned, save to the Countess, the circumstances, so far as she knew them, of her father's death, and the new ferryman, and the brightened up izba on the other side struck cold and strange on Mikhail.

What a tumult of rejoicing as they landed on the other side! Right in the forefront of the crowd stood Mikhail's old mother, clutching Vassily Pavlitch's arm, trembling with excitement, her wrinkled face lighted up with a beautiful and wonderful look which only mothers' faces take when their sons come home; and the maids of the village had put flowers in her hands, and told her she was to give them to Mikhail. And here was Mikhail, and she ran forward with a little cry, and scattered the wild flowers all over his head and shoulders as he bent to kiss her. And every girl there had flowers in her hair—they had been roaming the steppe all the morning for them, and Sergei was given sweet little bunches of them and scented herbs.

At the top of the hill the road divided. Sergei bade a friendly good-bye to his people and entered his uncle's grounds alone. Mikhail and the crowd turned into the village and moved slowly along to the Uriadnik's house, where an astounding feast had been prepared, almost every woman in the village having contributed to it either in labor or in kind.

Somehow, as Sergei entered the grounds round his uncle's house, the contrast between the pleasant tumult of the last hour and the chill silence here came cruelly home to him. Why did not the general appear? Only the grizzled butler, whom he had known as a child, stood at the front door to meet him, but instead of running forward with lively pleasure to greet his young barin, he looked troubled; he stood irresolute there rubbing his hands, seemingly intent on his shoe-buckles.

"Why, Yakov, what's the matter? Are you ill? Shake hands, man."

"Don't go yet, Panitch. I don't think you know what has been happening."

"Where's the general?"

"In his room with Grisha. They are at their prayers, and nobody dare disturb them."

"Yakov, tell me, what is all this about Grisha?"

"O, Panitch, it is terrible. Come into your own room, and I'll tell you all I know."

Sergei, followed by the old man, tramped along the lonely sounding corridors where decay and death had been playing sad havoc during the months of his absence. He reached his little room, sat down and told the butler to speak.

"Well, Panitch, it was late last autumn that Grisha came. He had been here off and on for some time before, but it was then that he came to live here. Panitch, you have not seen him lately. His face has altered greatly, and we notice it still more when he is in a rage or excited."

"What do you mean? Alters? Everybody's face alters under excitement."

"Yes, but not like Grisha's. Panitch, forgive me, but you never saw two faces more alike than Grisha's and the general's. And do you know what Grisha told Marfa!—that he was the general's son? And once the general nearly struck me because I pushed Grisha; and we have to attend on him now—Marfa and I; and he is dressed like a barin, and is always with his father—with the General, I mean; and the general speaks of him as Panitch Grisha."

Sergei could only stare at the butler.

"Leave me alone, Yakov, I want to think it all over. I must be by myself a little."

The old servant crept silently out of the room, and Sergei buried his face in his hands. What could he do? It was dusk when he finally made up his mind to go to his uncle. He went along the passage and paused outside the room from which muffled monotonous sounds came, as of some one reading. He knocked. There was no reply. He knocked louder, and still no reply. He opened the door. The atmosphere was thick with incense, but through the dense clouds he saw two figures sitting side by side.

Sergei looked long and fixedly at the strange pair. "It is true," he muttered to himself, "no one can doubt it, what does it mean?"

He bent over the old man—"Uncle, uncle, I am back again; Sergei is here."

The old man opened his eyes and looked up wearily—"Where is Vladimir? O, would see Vladimir before I die!" He closed his eyes again.

Grisha never ceased his gabble; he never recognized his old friend; he was staring straight through the cloud of incense to the glittering thing beyond. Sergei turned into his own room; such was his home-coming.

To be Concluded.

THE BOOK SHELF

A New England Barn-Raising.*

BY nine o'clock the whole male population from roundabout was whittling on the garden wall, or walking around the great skeleton that lay prone upon the ground beyond it. Mr. Odlin, the carpenter, gazed with laudable pride on those great timbers prepared by weeks of patient toil with axe and saw, square and line, adze and chisel.

He dispised no helpful suggestions which those men of trained eyes and judgment chose to make.

Dreadful accidents befell even carefullest framing; and he was glad to have them prove dimensions, and see that great wooden pins and wedges were secure.

"Seems tew me that j'ist is a grain long;" and Mr. Odlin would carefully remeasure.

"This brace-pin would stan' a leetle more drivin';" and sturdy blows from beetle or axe-head made it sure.

He went behind them all, making certain that joints were fastened, minding if the deep mortises in the enormous rills were exactly in line with the waiting tenons, testing by the square as he went along.

"Anything more, Mr. Wilson?"

"Not as I see."

"All ready!"

The tone was strong, rather than loud, but self-reliant and commanding. Shutting knife-blades clicked, hats and coats were thrown off, and the men gathered, silent and determined.

Mr. Odlin stationed known strong and reliable persons at the corner and centre posts; others held huge iron bars laid on the mortise edge to guide the tenons into place. Phil was at the north post. Half a dozen quick athletes were reserved for exigency, some with bars, some without. The rest were put along the plate, or evenly disposed among the timbers.

From then till the enormous framework rose in air they obeyed but one: the master workman; one law obtained: instant, concerted obedience.

"Take a long breath, men, and start ease. Are you ready?"

For answer each grasped what prostrate timber lay at his feet.

"Now, then, take it up, slow, steady, now she rises, stronger at the centre, ease off on the north post, lift, lift! Heave at the north! Take hold there!" turning to his reserve. An awful quiver ran through the half-raised frame. Though the lifting had been very slightly uneven, yet it had warped the north post so no joint could be made.

Phil stood there, tense as steel, with bar braced against that frightful weight, an only hope to those bent and strained beneath that shivering burden.

In that decisive moment Mr. Odlin was calm, swift, certain.

"Put two bars with Harmon's! Quick! Two men go to the centre; the rest take hold on the south end!"

They obeyed. Then he said quietly to those bent like saplings, "Hold a minit, men; hold hard." Then cheerily called,

"Are you right there, Harmon?"

"Ay!"

"One more; altogether now!"

A wrestler would have gloried in the corded, compact sinews shown in arm, shoulder, back, and leg, as the bowed mass knitted to straighten, and overcome the inertia of that dead weight.

"Good!" cried Mr. Odlin. "It moves; it's goin' up. Ha, that's it, once more, altogether. Hea-ee-ee-ee-ve."

A heavy thud, from the tenons striking the deep mortise beds, sounded all along the sill. Thankful murmurs rose from the group of women in the dooryard, who soon were bringing pails of steaming coffee to husbands and sons. Compliments were showered upon Phil, not in iterated phrases so much as by a few words fitly spoken; for those people were strangely provident of praise. He looked for two who came not.

When Eunice saw the side sway into place, and heard the clang of falling bars, she ran to the far shed, where 'Lisbeth found her cooling her swollen eyes. Going in to dinner, Phil received a few bright words from 'Lisbeth, but talkative Eunice was silent.

After the meal, boarding the barn, stories, and finally the antics of some who had imbibed too much New England rum, put it out of his mind. Lettice asked him to help take the witless men in.

"Are you a Washingtonian, Lettice?"

"Good land! I hope not. What is it?"

"A new-fangled notion for stoppin' rum-drinkin'."

"For a fact?"

"Yes."

"An' for good an' all?"

"Yes."

"Well," said she firmly, "then I'm it; an' I don't care a cent what it looks like."

"Mebby it'll die out, Lettice.

"If sech a thing as you speak on is sprouted, it'll live, Phil; live an' grow. Nobody nor nothin' can kill it, for it's rooted in sufferin' hearts, an' watered with bitterer tears than you ever dreamt on."

Friends in Heaven.*

Cultivating holy fellowships and renewing and developing human loves is one of the occupations of the heaven-life. We have Christ's word for this. He says. "Many shall come from the east and the west, the north and the south, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven." By the very constitution of our nature we require company. We have been made to enjoy nothing alone. We are contagious creatures, and catch inspiration from one another. On this account we are essential to one another. Hence there could be heaven for us if we were isolated from our kind.

The question is often asked, Shall we know one another in heaven? And it is asked sometimes with anxiety, Shall I have fellowship with my friend who on earth was the very soul of my soul? Yes, you shall. So certain is the fact that the question is almost foolish. It should never have had an existence. Our love for God shall continue; why not all other pure and kindred loves? To answer this question in the negative would imply a destruction which is quite opposite to the dealings of God with our nature. Memory would have to be abridged. Vision would have to be impaired. There would have to be a loss or a paralysis of our affectional nature. Something would have to fall out of our mental constitution before our friends could fall out of our life. If our friends fell out of our life, why not all remembrance and thought of our salvation and of our Saviour? The question is absurd.

Certain physical relations will cease there, but all soulful relations will continue, and these will be filled with joyful reminiscences which will keep us perpetually in the spirit and mood of praise. Shall we know our friends there? What is the significance of immortality if it means forgetfulness? How forgetfulness narrows this life? Of what use is immortality if we lose our identity? How can this life be a preparation for the next life if death obliterates all memory of it? The question should never have been raised. Pray that you may never grow away from those who have gone before, or out of sympathy with them.

A Naval Hero Dead.

N the death of Rear-Admiral Robert Wilson Shufeldt, United States Navy, the country loses one of its ablest sailors and bravest commanders. He was born in Dutchess co., New York State in 1822 and entered the vy as a midshipman in 1839. Step by p, through bravery and ability, he rose the post of Commodore in 1875, when made a cruise around the world in his gship Ticonderoga. He was appointed piter of the English and American govnments to settle the Liberian question, d was authorized to open negotiations th Corea for the protection of American e and property, as a result of which a aty was signed in 1883. This was the st convention negotiated with the Her- t Kingdom, and by it the commerce of t country was thrown open to the rld. He was appointed Rear-Admiral 1883 and retired in 1884. Admiral Shudt, during his service abroad, had many portunities of showing his friendship for e missionaries and never failed to give em encouragement and protection when eded. He leaves a daughter and two ns—one of the latter a distinguished thologist and the other connected with r consular service in China.

A COSTLY PROMISE.

HE cost of fulfilling a sailor's promise appears on the books of the Atlantic & St. Lawrence Railroad Company in an account recently closed. Thirty-three years ago the company needed a piece of d adjoining their road in Portland, Me., hich was owned by James Mountfort. mes Mountfort's brother Daniel had been ailor, and had placed the widow and ughter of one of his shipmates in a house the land, and had promised that they ould have it free of rent as long as they ed. Daniel lost his life in a shipwreck, t his brother James, to whom the house as left, knew of his brother's promise, d for his brother's sake left the house in ssession of the woman, rent free. When e railroad company wanted to purchase e land, James explained that the house on it was let on a life-lease to the two cupants. The company asked to see the ase, but James said, "My brother gave written lease, but gave his word for it long as they lived, which was higher d stronger than any written lease could ." He offered to sell the land at a low fice, on condition that the two women ere not turned out of the house, and the mpany purchased it on those conditions. As they afterward desired to pull down e house, they were obliged to pay the ost of another place for the women to e in, and this they continued to do as long as they lived. The widow soon ed, but the daughter lived for thirty ars, and the company find that the payents made, with interest upon them, mount to $3,808, which have been exnded rather than the old sailor's promshould be broken. This was as it ould be; but, if the two women had reseen the death of their benefactor, and e sale of the house by his brother, they ght have felt some diffidence about movg into his house. Their doubts would, wever, have proved groundless, for the omise was kept. That is the difficulty ith anxious Christians; they read God's omises, but they do not "move in:" who appropriate them testify that God faithful to the end.

Led to Christ by a Child.

A recent Gospel meeting in England, Mr. Orr-Ewing, a revivalist, told this pathetic incident: "An English missionary, with his wife and little boy, were busy carrying the Gospel message to the Chinese. The boy was only seven years of age, but though delicate of constitution and feeble of health, he had a wondrous power over the natives, and they would often gather round him to hear about Jesus. Among them was an old man upon whom the parents could make no impression, but the words of their son seemed to touch his heart. The child's disease increased, and it was evident that his end was near. For the last time the natives gathered round his bedside, and among them the old idolator; but the sight of the child's joy in the prospect of death broke down his opposition, and he resolved to become a Christian. Next day the sorrowing parents consigned to the grave the body of their child, a large company of natives following. On the following day the father and mother went to visit the grave of their loved one. As they approached, they saw the figure of the old man raise himself from the ground, where he had been kneeling, and advance to meet them. He told the missionary that while the words of the older missionaries had been unable to turn him from his idols, that little boy had led him from darkness to light. 'And now,' he continued, 'it shall be my loving duty to tend that grave throughout my life. While I live there shall always be fresh flowers placed upon it, and when I am gone I shall leave instructions to my children, and to my children's children, that they shall continue to tend that grave and put flowers upon it.' How the Lord blesses the simple word spoken in his name!"

THE GREATEST PLEASURE.

At a dinner party in Baltimore many years ago, at which were present among the guests George Peabody and Johns Hopkins, some one inquired, "Which did you enjoy most, Mr. Peabody, making your money or giving it away?" "Well," answered Mr. Peabody, slowly, and Johns Hopkins was observed to be deeply interested in the answer, "I enjoyed making money. I think it is a great pleasure to make money. And when the idea was first suggested to me that I gave money away, it did not please me at all. In fact, it distressed me. But I though the matter over, and concluded I'd try it on a small scale. So I built the first of the model tenement houses in London. It was a hard pull. But after it was done, I went around among the poor people living in the rooms, so clean and comfortable, and I had quite a new feeling. I enjoyed it very much. So I gave some more and the feeling increased. And now I can truly say that, much as I enjoyed making my money, I enjoyed giving it away a great deal better."

MISSIONARIES THREATENED.

An aftermath of the terrible butchery of Armenians in Trebizond came in the startling news by cable that the Turkish fanatics had threatened to burn the famous American college at Marsovan, Asia Minor. Every precaution was taken to prevent so diabolical an incendiarism. Thus far the would-be incendiaries have not been discovered. It will be recalled that the agitation against the Americans at Marsovan began about a year ago, when a number of pupils of the American college were expelled because their fathers were suspected of being implicated in the Armenian movement. This caused suspicion to fall upon the professors of the college, five in number, and two of whom are Americans. Mr. Terrell notified the authorities at Washington that Garabed, a naturalized American citizen, had been assassinated at Marsovan, close to the church door, as he was going to attend a religious service. At the same time Mr. Terrell notified the State Department at Washington that the revolutionists had marked the professors at Marsovan for slaughter long before the Sassoun atrocities were committed. Eventually a Turkish guard was furnished to the college at the request of Mr. Terrell

CHOLERA IN MOROCCO.

In a recent letter, Mr. H. N. Patrick, a missionary at Tangier, says: "Cholera in its worst form is decimating the population, more than seven hundred having died in Tangier alone within the past five weeks, whilst quite that number have died in the surrounding villages. In Tetuan, forty-five miles from Tangier, over 300 Moors have died within the last six days. The alarm and the distress are very great. Work is suspended and the shops are closed. The cemeteries are full, and now the corpses are being interred in the market-place, about one foot only from the surface of the ground. The effect of this a little later on will be awful." The cholera has been traced directly to the "pilgrims," who brought it from Mecca.

TRADE BOOTH'S HYOMEI "DRI-AYR" MARK

(Pronounced Hi-o-my.)

The Australian Dry-Air Treatment by Inhalation of Hay Fever, Catarrh, Asthma, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Etc.

MASS. CHARITABLE EYE AND EAR INFIRMARY, No. 176 Charles Street, BOSTON, MASS., February 11, 1895.

I am wonderfully surprised with the results of Hyomei for bronchitis and bleeding of the lungs in cases of dull, heavy cough, with expectoration of offensive matter, it acts like magic. Hyomei, used by patients with the Inhaler well charged, has never failed to produce good results. It is also the greatest thing in the world for catarrh. I can recommend it to all.

Yours truly, J. A. COLLINS.

The air, thoroughly charged with Hyomei inhaled through the Pocket Inhaler at the mouth, and commingling the minutest air cells, is slowly exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, inexpensive, and gives immediate relief. It stops all disease, coughing instantly, clears the voice, expands the chest and increases the breathing capacity.

His Rent Paid for Life.

How a Bowery Rough's Question Was Answered in Due Time.

MR. H. B. GIBBUD, of the Syracuse Gospel Mission, and who for a number of years was actively engaged in mission work in New York, recently related this most interesting chapeer in his experience: I was at work on the Bowery, and was talking with a man who had been drinking. My friends stood waiting for me. I noticed one of a gang of thieves, who were lounging around the door of a concert hall, leave his companions, approach my friends and enter into conversation. I left my man and joined them. I said: 'My friend, I know you and your game; I should think a man like you would want to be in a better business than roping in unsuspecting people. It's mighty mean business—that of a thief—don't you think so!' He looked and acted as though he was about to make some 'forcible' remarks, but before he could do anything, I laid my hand on his shoulder and said, 'You ought to be a Christian!' He started back as though struck, but quickly recovered, and said with a sneer, 'Me a Christian? Will Christ pay my rent? Will Christ feed me?' 'Well,' I said, 'I have seen a good many start without a cent or a place to lay their head, and I never knew one he let go down who was really in earnest.' 'But, see here, did you ever see Christ?' 'No; but I expect to see him; I have his word that I shall.' Turning to his companions, he called out, 'Come here and see a fellow who is going to see Christ.'

It was about two o'clock in the morning. Quite a number who were passing stopped. I found myself in the centre of a typical Bowery crowd—Jew and Gentile, a number of sporting men and thieves, two three tramps, several drunken men and others attracted by the crowd stood listening. As his companions joined him he said, "This fellow is going to see Christ." "Yes," I said, opening the Bible. "I have his word for it; I will read it to you, 'Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.'" "Oh, you are a son of God, are you?" "Yes, and I have his word for that," reading the Bible again. "'As many as received him to them He gave power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name.'" "Well, brother, here's my hand; I am a child of God, too," he said winking at his companions. "Oh, no!" said I, "don't call me brother; you don't belong to the Lord's family. 'Ye are of your father the devil.'" And I read from Romans 'Know ye not to whom ye yield yourself servants to obey: His servants ye are to whom ye obey,' and your regular business is serving the devil, and you can't palm yourself off on me as one of God's family, but you may be adopted into His family if you will." Then I read John 3:16, "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life."

A man who had had one of his ears nearly cut off in a fight and whose head was bandaged, said: "You had better take a back seat, Bill; he's too much for you?" Bill turned with an oath and said, "You had better get out, there is nothing here for a man with one ear." At this the crowd laughed and jeered him. He was making his way out of the crowd, when I reached over and caught him by the shoulder, and said, "Hold on, friend, there is something for you," and turning to Revelation I read, "He that hath an ear to hear let him hear; to him that overcometh I will give to eat of the tree of life." The crowd laughed heartily at this quotation and I felt that I had gained their sympathies. I gave them all an invitation to attend our meetings. A few did attend, and one, at least, afterward gave evidence of a sincere desire to lead a Christian life.

One night, at the Gospel meeting, he approached Mr. Gibbud and said:

"Do you remember, Bill, the man who abused you and wanted to know if Christ would pay his rent?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Well—the devil has paid his rent for life. He has just been sentenced for life for shooting a man on the Bowery.

And so the question of the scoffer brought its own answer.

DEFORMED HINDOO TEACHER.

IN a letter from a missionary in India is the following description of the work of a zealous Hindoo convert: On visiting one of our schools in Allahabad, I noticed a poor working-girl, deformed from spinal disease. I knew from her dress, poor as it was, that she was a Christian child. She told me her name was Agnes, and that she was fourteen or fifteen years old; but she was very small, and as ignorant as any of the Hindoo girls. I inquired about her, and found she belonged to so low a family that no church was willing to recognize her. This girl, hearing a school was opened within her reach, determined to attend it, although the teacher was a Hindoo girl. She was always present, and so diligent, that from knowing nothing, she made rapid progress and learned to love her Bible. Some weeks ago she asked me if she might open a school near her house, as many women and girls wished to learn. Some, she told me, she had been teaching ever since she knew enough to do so! Two days ago I went to see what progress she was making, and found thirty-three women and girls sitting outside on the ground, as their little mud hut would not hold so many. Agnes was moving among them like a queen, and evidently much beloved and respected. A sister is helping her. I do not know when I have felt more encouraged than in seeing what this young girl is now, remembering how short the time is since she was perfectly ignorant.

LEAD ME, O LORD.

I DO not ask, O Lord, that life may be
A pleasant road:
I do not ask that thou wouldst take from me
Aught of its load.

I do not ask that flowers should always spring, Beneath my feet;
I know too well the poison and the sting
Of things too sweet

For one thing only, Lord, dear Lord, I plead—
Lead me aright,
Though strength should falter and though heart should bleed,
Through peace to light.

I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see;
Better in darkness just to feel thy hand,
And follow thee.

Joy is like restless day, but peace divine
Like quiet night;
Lead me, O Lord, till perfect day shall shine
Through peace to light!

Showers of Blessing.

THE Bowery Mission, so favorably located on the great thoroughfare that has long been synonymous with vice and crime of every shade and degree, has been singularly blessed during the past six months. The Converts' Prayer-meeting that was begun at the outset of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S control on April last, has a regular attendance of about 200, which is constantly being augmented from those who attend the nightly services, and many find a Saviour in Jesus Christ. The usual nightly attendance fills the hall, which has a seating capacity of about 400.

The record of those who have professed conversion from April first to October first was 3,428 souls, which, considering the warm months intervening, presents really a very remarkable showing. Many of these have stepped out of lives that had become dissipated and vicious and are now upright and honorable men. Not a few have passed from idleness into lives of industry and are now useful members of society.

To appreciate this fully, it would be necessary to see a Bowery Mission audience. Men who may well be considered as the unfortunate, without shelter or food and but scantily clothed, for the greater part without friends and without hope, come there to receive consolation. The light and the singing attract and allure, if only to secure for the moment a resting-place. Then the story of the Gospel awakens within their heart thoughts of other and brighter days. Many a mother's boy, who has come to the great city and has been ensnared in the many meshes that are spread for the unwary, thus finds a beacon that lights his path to the Saviour and restores him to mother and friends.

A JAPANESE DEMETRIUS.

The opposition which the great apostle of the Gentiles encountered at Ephesus (Acts 19: 23–28) from Demetrius, the silversmith, is met with by missionaries in our day when their preaching affects business interests. Mr. McKim, in the course of his story of work in Japan, mentions an instance. He says: When I was at Yamato I visited Nara, where the catechist is doing a good work. Nara, as you know, has been a stronghold of Buddhism, and many of the people derive their support from the making of shrines and from the pilgrimages made by large numbers every year. The only opposition of any importance is, therefore, from those who see that their craft is endangered by the propagation of Christianity. The keeper of a pleasure resort of questionable reputation, meeting the catechist one day, said: "You are a bad man." The catechist, surprised, asked why. "Because you are taking from me my best customers." I was at Nara two days. The second night I was invited by a barber interested in Christianity to preach at his house, situated in the very centre of the city. The whole of the front was thrown open, and the catechist and I preached to a large crowd, who listened most respectfully and attentively. We also preached at Kudara Mura to about fifty persons who met in a farm-house to hear us. We have one Christian man in this village whose good example is doing much to commend Christ to his neighbors. A number of the people at this place are deeply interested.

A HAUNTED CHINAMAN.

One of the medical missionaries attached to the China Inland Mission, while laboring in Han-chung, was called to see a man very dangerously wounded. He was about forty, and he had one little girl who attended school, and two wives who would like to attend the women's class, but he would not let them. He had three or four silk looms and several workmen. The previous day he had stabbed himself in three places, the only explanation being that the house was said to be haunted by a devil, and at night he could hear it moaning. Upon the night in question he heard it more than ever. This made him so miserable that in a fit of desperation he seized a great knife and stabbed himself. The next thing was to hire a necromancer to come, who, by means of writing certain cabalistic characters on strips of yellow paper, is supposed to be able to ward off the approach of evil. Of these papers some are posted up over the lintels of the door, others are pinned on to the bed, and yet another folded up very small and pinned to his clothes. But this necromancer did not stop here, but proceeded in his own crude way to treat the wound by stitching it partially up, not with silk thread, but with the delicate fibres of the mulberry tree roots, which are supposed to have anti-febrile virtues. "This, however," says the missionary, "he accomplished so badly, that on the patient coughing the wound gaped. He then merely covered it all up with one of the universal black plasters of the appearance and consistency of tar spread on paper. They next sent for me at the patient's special request. Prayer was made that he might recover, and that it might be the beginning of better days for the whole family, and it was answered. God's mercy permitted him to come back, as it were, from the very brink of the grave, and afforded him time to turn from idols to serve the living God."

"FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH.

When the noble-hearted Christian, Captain Allan Gardiner, was dying of slow starvation on the desolate shores of Pictou Island, he yet painted on the entrance of the cavern which was his only shelter, a hand pointing downward to the words:

"My soul, wait thou still upon God, for my hope is in him."

Near that mute, pathetic symbol of unshaken trust his skeleton was found.

To die of hunger on an Antarctic shore among savages, not one of whom he had succeeded in converting—could anything look like a deadlier failure? And yet from that heroic death of faithful anguish has sprung a great American mission.

If Allan Gardiner's death was a failure, it was one of those failures which are the seed of the most infinite, of the most transcendent successes. For such men the world is waiting. "For such men and women God seeks." Rivers of living water "flow from them." Their lives illustrate to us the meaning of the words, "The obedience of faith."

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2.

A SOLVENT FOR STONE IN THE BLADDER.

Dr. B. J. Weistling, of Middletown, Pa., states:

"Experience in its use in Stone in the Bladder, in my own person, enables me to attest the efficacy of the BUFFALO LITHIA WATER in this painful malady. After having been subjected to sufferings, the intensity of which cannot be described, I have, under the influence of the water, passed an ounce of Calculi (Uric Acid), some of which weighed as much as four grains, affording inexpressible relief and leaving me in a condition of comparative ease and comfort. "On one occasion I passed thirty-five Calculi in forty-eight hours. The appearance of this Calculus Nuclei indicates unmistakably, I think, that they were all component particles of one large Calculus, destroyed by the action of the water, by means of solution and disintegration. At my advanced period of life (I am seventy-seven years and six months of age), and in my feeble general health, a surgical operation was not to be thought of, and the water seems to have accomplished all that such an operation, if successful, could have done."

The above plate is from a photograph, and represents the exact size and shape of some of the Calculi passed by Dr. Weistling.

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 each, at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent to any address.

DR. HUNTER'S LECTURES ON THE LUNGS.

BRONCHITIS.

No. 5.

The terms "Bronchitis," "Catarrhal Consumption," and "Catarrhal Bronchitis" are used indiscriminately to designate a disease of the tubes of the lungs, which very closely resembles consumption in symptoms, but is different in nature from that disease.

The causes which produce Bronchial disease are a deep cold on the chest, or an attack of grippe, or a congestion of the mucous lining of the lungs, or breathing a dusty, irritating atmosphere. It occurs in several forms, according to the age and state of the patient. In elderly people it is attended by coughs, shortness of breath, and a copious expectoration of thin mucous resembling gum water, coming on in morning and evening attacks. In younger people the matter coughed up is at first white, but gradually changes to a yellow color, attended by afternoon fever, night sweats, and sometimes by spittings of blood, in which case there is always loss of flesh and strength and the disease is generally mistaken for consumption. In some people the active symptoms subside during the warmth of summer, and regularly become aggravated as cold weather approaches. During the winter season such cases are very liable to develop into consumption.

The most common form of this disease is called dry Bronchitis. In this the expectorated matter is a dull glutinous stuff of a bluish white or pearl gray color—very tenacious and hard to raise. It clings around the vocal chords and makes the voice husky. It clogs the air tubes and shortens the breathing, and sometimes completely blocks up tubes of considerable size, shutting off the air from the air cells, and actually killing the function of that part of the lungs which those tubes supply.

Dry Bronchitis is the most insidious of all lung complaints. The patient is always getting better if we accept his own account of himself, and yet as certainly relapsing into a worse condition than before. The difficulty of breathing becomes more marked and the patient complains of a tightness in the chest, which is only relieved by coughing up a quantity of the tough, jelly-like substance before described. On inquiry of a person so afflicted if he has any cough, he will almost certainly answer no, and yet during your conversation will hack and raise this jelly-like mucous half a-dozen times. Sometimes the cough comes on in paroxysms, when they are called asthmatic. If the stomach be deranged, it is supposed to be only a stomach cough or to come from a torpid liver, or some other derangement of the general health. Alas! there are few who are afflicted with any form of Bronchitis who do not sooner or later come to fill a consumptive's grave. Here are four different forms of the disease, all dangerous to life and directly tending to consumption, but not consumption at all. They may terminate fatally before there are any bacilli in the lungs, or any tubercles, but generally end in consumption. Happily, they are not contagious. Inhalation. Rely upon it, neither change of air abroad nor any combination of medicines by the stomach will ever cure even the simplest form of Chronic Bronchitis. Local treatment of the lungs by properly adapted and applied inhalations is the only logical method of cure there is for any kind of Bronchial Disease.

Scrambled Eggs

Take a small quantity of Cottolene and a little cream; warm in a frying pan. Break 6 eggs in it and stir until slightly cooked. Serve hot.

Use not more than two-thirds as much Cottolene as you would butter and be sure that you do not overheat it before dropping in the eggs. This is always essential in cooking with Cottolene.

Genuine Cottolene is sold everywhere in tins with trade marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin. Made only by

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

SAFETY FOR YOUNG MEN.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: II. Sam. 18: 29, "Is the young man Absalom safe?"

THE heart of David, the father, was wrapped up in his boy Absalom. He was a splendid boy, judged by the rules of worldly criticism. From the crown of his head to the sole of his foot there was not a single blemish. The Bible says that he had such a luxuriant shock of hair, that when once a year it was shorn, what was cut off weighed over three pounds. But, notwithstanding all his brilliancy of appearance, he was a bad boy, and broke his father's heart. He was plotting to get the throne of Israel. He had marshalled an army to overthrow his father's government. The day of battle had come. The conflict was begun. David, the father, sat between the gates of the palace waiting for the tidings of the conflict. Oh, how rapidly his heart beat with emotion. Two great questions were to be decided: the safety of his boy, and the continuance of the throne of Israel. After awhile, a servant, standing on the top of the house, looks off, and sees some one running. He is coming with great speed, and the man on top of the house announces the coming of the messenger, and the father watches and waits, and as soon as the messenger from the field of battle comes within hailing distance, the father cries out. Is it a question in regard to the establishment of his throne? Does he say: "Have the armies of Israel been victorious? Am I to continue in my imperial authority? Have I overthrown my enemies?" Oh! no. There is one question that springs from his heart to the lip, and springs from the lip into the ear of the besweated and bedusted messenger flying from the battlefield—the question, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" When it was told to David, the King, that, though his armies had been victorious, his son had been slain, the father turned his back upon the congratulations of the nation, and went up the stairs of his palace, his heart breaking as he went, wringing his hands sometimes, and then again pressing them against his temples as though he would press them in, crying: "Oh, Absalom! my son! my son! Would God I had died for thee, Oh, Absalom! my son! my son!"

My friends, the question which David, the King, asked in regard to his son, is the question that resounds to-day in the hearts of hundreds of parents. Yea, there are a great multitude of young men who know that the question of the text is appropriate when asked in regard to them. They know the temptations by which they are surrounded; they see so many who started life with as good resolutions as they have who have fallen in the path, and they are ready to hear me ask the question of my text: "Is the young man Absalom safe?" The fact is that this life is full of peril. He who undertakes it without the grace of God and a proper understanding of the conflict into which he is going, must certainly be defeated. Just look off upon society to-day. Look at the shipwreck of [illegible] whom fair things were promised, and who started life with every advantage. Look at those who have dropped from high social position, and from great fortune, disgraced for time, disgraced for eternity. All who sacrifice their integrity come to overthrow. Take a dishonest dollar and bury it in the centre of the earth, and keep all the rocks of the mountain on top of it; then cover these rocks with all the diamonds of Golconda, and all the silver of Nevada, and all the gold of California and Australia, and put on the top of these all banking and moneyed institutions, and they cannot keep down that one dishonest dollar. That one dishonest dollar in the centre of the earth will begin to heave and rock and upturn itself until it comes to the resurrection of damnation. "As the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches and not by right shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."

Now, what are the safeguards of young men? The first safeguard of which I want to speak is a love of home. There are those who have no idea of the pleasures that concentrate around that word "home." Perhaps your early abode was shadowed with vice or poverty. Harsh words, and petulance, and scowling may have destroyed all the sanctity of that spot. Love, kindness, and self-sacrifice, which have built their altars in so many abodes, were strangers in your father's house. God pity you, young man; you never had a home. But a multitude in this audience can look back to a spot that they can never forget. It may have been a lowly roof, but you cannot think of it now without a dash of emotion. You have seen nothing on earth that so stirred your soul. A stranger passing along that place might see nothing remarkable about it; but oh! how much it means to you. Fresco on palace wall does not mean so much to you as those rough-hewn rafters. Parks and bowers and trees on fashionable watering-place or country-seat do not mean so much to you as that brook that ran in front of the plain farm-house, and singing under the weeping willows. The barred gateway swung open by porter in full dress, does not mean as much to you as that swing-gate, your sister on one side of it, and you on the other; she gone fifteen years ago into glory. That scene coming back to you to-day, as you swept backward and forward on the gate, singing the songs of your childhood. But there are those here who have their second dwelling-place. It is your adopted home. That also is sacred for ever. There you established the first family altar. There your children were born. In that room flapped the wing of the death angel. Under that roof, when your work is done, you expect to lie down and die. There is only one word in all the language that can convey your idea of that place, and that word is "home." Now, let me say that I never knew a man who was faithful to his early and adopted home who was given over at the same time to any gross form of wickedness. If you find more enjoyment in the club-room, in the literary society, in the art-salon, than you do in these unpretending home pleasures, you are on the road to ruin. Though you may be cut off from your early associates, and though you may be separated from all your kindred, young man, is there not a room somewhere that you can call your own? Though it be the fourth story of a third-class boarding house, into that room gather books, pictures, and a harp. Hang your mother's portrait over the mantel. Bid unholy mirth stand back from that threshold. Consecrate some spot in that room with the knee of prayer. By the memory of other days, a father's counsel, a mother's love, and a sister's confidence, call it home.

Another safeguard for these young men is industrious habit. There are a great many people trying to make their way through the world with their wits instead of by honest toil. There is a young man who comes from the country to the city. He fails twice before he is as old as his father was when he first saw the spires of the great town. He is seated in his room at a rent of two thousand dollars a year, waiting for the banks to declare their dividends and the stocks to run up. After awhile he gets impatient. He tries to improve his penmanship by making copy-plates of other merchants' signatures! Never mind—all is right in business. After awhile he has his estate. Now is the time for him to retire to the country, amid the flocks and the herds, to culture the domestic virtues.

Now the young men who were his school-mates in boyhood will come, and with their ox teams draw him logs, and with their hard hands will help to heave up the castle. That is no fancy sketch; it is every-day life. I should not wonder if there were a rotten beam in that palace. I should not wonder if God should smite him with dire sicknesses, and pour into his cup a bitter draught that will thrill him with unbearable agony. I should not wonder if that man's children grew up to be to him a disgrace, and to make his life a shame. I should not wonder if that man died a dishonorable death, and were tumbled into a dishonorable grave, and then went into the gnashing of teeth. The way of the ungodly shall perish.

Oh! young man, you must have industry of head, or hand, or foot, or perish. Do not have the idea that you can get along in the world by genius. The curse of this country to-day is geniuses—men with large self-conceit and nothing else. The man who proposes to make his living by his wits probably has not any. I should rather be an ox, plain and plodding and useful, than to be an eagle, high-flying and good-for-nothing but to pick out the eyes of carcasses. Even in the Garden of Eden it was not safe for Adam to be idle, so God made him an horticulturist; and if the married pair had kept busy dressing the vines, they would not have been sauntering under the trees, hankering after fruit that ruined them and their posterity! Proof positive of the fact that when people do not attend to their business they get into mischief. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways and be wise; which, having no overseer or guide, provideth her food in the summer and gathereth her meat in the harvest." Satan is a roaring lion, and you can never destroy him by gun or pistol or sword. The weapons with which you are to beat him back are pen, and type and hammer and adze, and saw, and pickaxe, and yardstick, and the weapon of honest toil. Work, work, or die.

Another safeguard that I want to present to young men is a high ideal of life. Sometimes soldiers going into battle shoot into the ground instead of into the hearts of their enemies. They are apt to take aim too low, and it is very often that the captain, going into conflict with his men, will cry out, "Now, men, aim high!" The fact is that in life a great many men take no aim at all. The artist plans out his entire thought before he puts it upon canvas, before he takes up the crayon or the chisel. An architect thinks out the entire building before the workmen begin. Although everything may seem to be unorganized, that architect has in his mind every Corinthian column, every Gothic arch, every Byzantine capital. A p[illegible] thinks out the entire plot of his poem before he begins to chime the cantos of tilling rhythms. And yet there are a gr[illegible] many men who start the important str[illegible]ture of life without knowing whether i[illegible] going to be a rude Tartar's hut, or a Mark's Cathedral, and begin to write the intricate poem of their life with knowing whether it is to be a Hom[illegible] "Odyssey" or a rhymester's botch. C[illegible] of one thousand, nine hundred and nine nine have no life-plot. Booted and spur[illegible] and caparisoned, they hasten along, I run out and say: "Hallo, man! Whit[illegible] away?" "Nowhere!" they say. C[illegible] young man, make every day's duty a[illegible]ing up of the great life-plot. Alas! t[illegible] there should be on this sea of life so ma[illegible] ships that seem bound for no port. Th[illegible] are swept every whither by wind [illegible] wave, up by the mountains and down the valleys. They sail with no ch[illegible] They gaze on no star. They long for harbor. Oh! young man, have a h[illegible] ideal and press to it, and it will be a mig[illegible] safeguard. There never were grander [illegible]portunities opening before young men th[illegible] are opening now. Young men of the str[illegible] arm, and of the stout heart, and of bounding step, I marshal you to-day f[illegible] great achievement.

Another safeguard is a respect for Sabbath. Tell me how a young man spe[illegible] his Sabbath, and I will tell you w[illegible] are his prospects in business, and I [illegible] tell you what are his prospects for eternal world. God has thrust into busy life a sacred day when we are look after our souls. Is it exorbitant, a giving six days to the feeding and cloth of these perishable bodies, that God sho[illegible] demand one day for the feeding and cl[illegible]ing of the immortal soul?

Our bodies are seven-day clocks, [illegible] they need to be wound up, and if they not wound up they run down into grave. No man can continuously br[illegible] the Sabbath and keep his physical [illegible] mental health. Ask those aged men [illegible] they will tell you they never knew [illegible] who continuously broke the Sabbath [illegible] did not fail in mind, body, or moral pri[illegible]ple. A manufacturer gave this as his perience. He said: "I owned a factory the Lehigh. Everything prospered. I k[illegible] the Sabbath, and everything went on w[illegible] But one Sabbath morning I bethou[illegible] myself of a new shuttle, and I thoug[illegible] would invent that shuttle before suns[illegible] and I refused all food and drink until I [illegible] completed that shuttle. By sundow[illegible] had completed it. The next day, Mond[illegible] I showed to my workmen and friends [illegible] new shuttle. They all congratulated [illegible] on my great success. I put that shu[illegible] into play. I enlarged my business; b[illegible] sir, that Sunday's work cost me $30,0[illegible] From that day everything went wrong failed in business, and I lost my mi[illegible] Oh, my friends, keep the Lord's day. Y[illegible] may think it old-fogy advice, but I giv[illegible] to you now; "Remember the Sabb[illegible] day and keep it holy. Six days sh[illegible] thou labor and do all thy work; but [illegible] seventh is the Sabbath of the Lord [illegible] God; in it thou shalt not do any wor[illegible] A man said that he would prove that [illegible] this was a fallacy, and so he said: I sh[illegible] raise a Sunday crop." And he plough[illegible] the field on the Sabbath, and then he in the seed on the Sabbath and he cult[illegible]ed the ground on the Sabbath. When [illegible] harvest was ripe he reaped it on the S[illegible]bath, and he carried it into the mow [illegible] the Sabbath, and then he stood out defi[illegible] to his Christian neighbors and s[illegible] "There, that is my Sunday crop, and I [illegible] all garnered." After awhile a storm ca[illegible] up, and a great darkness, and the lig[illegible]nings of heaven struck the barn, a[illegible] away went his Sunday crop.

There is another safeguard that I w[illegible] to present. I have saved it until the l[illegible] because I want it to be the more empha[illegible] The great safeguard for every young m[illegible] is the Christian religion. Nothing [illegible] ke the place of it. You may have grace-lness enough to put to the blush Lord hesterfield, you may have foreign languges dropping from your tongue, you may scuss laws and literature, you may have pen of unequaled polish and power, you ay have so much business tact that you n get the largest salary in a banking use, you may be as sharp as Herod and strong as Samson, and with as long cks as those which hung Absalom, and t you have no safety against tempta-

n. Some of you look forward to life ith great despondency. I know it. I see in your faces from time to time. You y: "All the occupations and professions e full, and there's no chance for me."
h! young man, cheer up, I will tell you w you can make your fortune. Seek st the kingdom of God and his rightusness, and all other things will be add-
. I know you do not want to be mean this matter. You will not drink the imming cup of life, and then pour the gs on God's altar. To a generous Savr you will not act like that; you have t the heart to act like that. That is not nly. That is not honorable. That is t brave. Your great want is a new art, and in the name of the Lord Jesus rist I tell you so to-day. and the bless-Spirit presses through the solemnities this hour to put the cup of life to your irsty lips. Oh! thrust it not back.
ercy presents it—bleeding mercy, longffering morcy. Despise all other friend-ips, prove recreant to all other bargains, t despise God's love for your dying soul do not do that. There comes a crisis in nan's life, and the trouble is he does not ow it is the crisis. I got a letter in which nan says to me:

"I start out now to preach the Gospel righteousness and temperance to the ople. Do you remember me? I am the n who appeared at the close of the ser-e when you were worshipping in the apel after you came from Philadelphia.
you remember at the close of the ser-e a man coming up to you all a-tremble
th conviction, and crying out for mercy, d telling you he had a very bad business, d he thought he would change it? That s the turning point in my history. I gave my bad business. I gave my heart to d, and the desire to serve him has grown on me all these years, until now woe is to me if I preach not the Gospel."

That Sunday night was the turning point that young man's history. This very bbath hour will be the turning point in history of a hundred young men in this use. God help us. I once stood on an niversary platform with a clergyman o told this marvelous story. He said:
'Thirty years ago two young men start-out to attend Park Theatre, New York, see a play which made religion ridicus and hypocritical. They had been ught up in Christian families. They rted for the theatre to see that vile y, and their early convictions came k upon them. They felt it was not ht to go, but still they went. They ne to the door of the theatre. One of young men stopped and started for ne, but returned and came up to the or, but had not the courage to go in. He in started for home, and went home.
e other young man went in. He went m one degree of temptation to another.
ught in the whirl of frivolity and sin, sank lower and lower. He lost his siness position. He lost his morals. He t his soul. He died a dreadful death, one star of mercy shining on it. I nd before you to-day," said that minis-
, "to thank God that for twenty years ave been permitted to preach the Gos-
. I am the other young man."

Oh! you see that was the turning point he one went back, the other went on.
e great roaring world of business life
l soon break in upon you, young men.
ll the wild wave dash out the impresns of this day as an ocean billow dashes ers out of the sand on the beach? You nd something better than this world can ge you. I beat on your heart and it nds hollow. You want something great al grand and glorious to fill it, and here is t religion that can do it. God save you!

Gave His Life for Christ.

The Thrilling Story of Mirza Ibrahim, of Persia, Teacher and Hero-Martyr.

JESSE MALIK YONAN, of Oroomiah, a young Christian medical missionary of Persia, now visiting in this country, has written the wonderful story of Mirza Ibrahim, the martyr for the truth as it is in Jesus. This is his story, and it should be read by Christians the world over:

Mirza Ibrahim was a man of between fifty and sixty years of age, of a noble family, himself a learned man, well versed in the Koran and Mohammedan religion. He was a very strong adherent of the Moslem faith, and could argue religious subjects very intelligently. In the city of Khoi, in the northwestern province of Azerbaijan, where he lived, he came in contact with a native preacher by the name of Warda, who talked to him about Christ. At last he told the preacher that he accepted Christ and wanted to be baptized.

The avowal of Christian faith by a Moslem is on his part nothing less than a sure way to death. Mirza Ibrahim, however, would not listen to any proposal for private baptism. He boldly acknowledged his conversion, and was baptized in the mission chapel by Rev. Mr. Mecklin, of Salmas, in the year 1889. Soon after that the hatred and violence of fanatical Moslems around him was awakened. He was brought into the court. His wife and property were taken from him; his two daughters were obliged to spit in his face in the presence of a large Mohammedan gathering; then he himself, sick and feeble, was forced to flee. He came southward to Oroomiah, about one hundred miles from Khoi. Here he was received by the missionaries and employed by them at a salary of $3.50 a month as a copyist, and also that he might preach Christ for the Moslems of Oroomiah. The devotion and love he had for the Holy Scriptures was simply wonderful. He studied the Bible thoroughly. The longer he stayed in Oroomiah the more enthusiastic he became in his desire to preach. Then he went out of the city to the surrounding villages, walking from place to place as an Evangelist, and preaching with fearlessness and vigor. For nearly a year he kept this up, until at last, when he was in a village in Bar-Andeez, in the house of a young preacher with whom he worked, the news came to the Kahn (ruler of that village), who sent a messenger to the preacher, requiring him to put Ibrahim out of his house. The preacher answered: "I will not put him out, for he is my brother."
